Violet, you say it does not hurt to tell the truth. If that is so why is it you and other German colonists and German sympathizers scorn the truth? Evidently the truth must hurt or you would not be so afraid to indulge in it. Some people might call your letter old stuff, and say that nothing was to be gained by opening up old sores. I would not dignify your epistle by replying to it if I did not continue to receive a perfect avalanche of letters, all filled with the same heresies and repeating o'er and o'er again the same old stupid lies that were dinned into everyone's ears by German propagandists from 1914 on. Germany, or at least the more sensible section of the German people, are trying to put their country on its feet. The present government is confronted on one side by the junkers (military reactionaries who want to restore the monarchy), and on the other hand by the still more dangerous Spartacides, who would be more fiendish and dangerous than even was that mad lunatic, the Kaiser. There are still a number of people in Germany who, though all the facts of the war are being placed before them, so that Germany can get the truth, set herself right in the eyes of the world and regain the respect of mankind, still believe, even as you and a good many more in your section do, that this war was forced upon Germany. I would not waste space trying to convince those who get their ideas from Milwaukee, but so much of untruth has been spread by the propagandists in that city, that millions of Americans have had their minds poisoned by the venomous contagion that is disseminated from this and other tainted alien sources. However, I would have made this letter the subject for an editorial if only for one thing and that is to let the American people know the facts and all the truth about the Lusitania.

The Lusitania survivors, or at least many of them, sued the Cunard Company for the loss of their property and the lives of their relatives. This matter has been threshed out in Great Britain and now in the Federal District Court of New York. The judge's decision, which covers nine closely printed pages, is before me. In this decision the judge absolves the Cunard line from any guilt or carelessness and tells the claimants for damages that they must be collected at the Peace Table by the United States and the Allies, or in other words from Germany. He describes the sinking of the Lusitania, which carried no armanent for her protection (though the Germans picture her on the medal struck to commemorate her sinking, as though she were a mighty battleship with guns bristling from every porthole), as "an inexpressibly cowardly attack," which violated all the laws of nations, let alone the laws of God and humanity.

The Lusitania was a peaceful merchant ship. If she had not been so she would not have been allowed to sail from any American port. Also she was pre-eminently a first-class passenger ship, and certainly such famous men as Charles Frohman, the great theatrical magnate, Alfred Vanderbilt, Elbert Hubbard, the journalist, and others would not have risked their lives on a vessel filled with high explosives. But the one great lie, which propagandists have tried desperately to use, to deceive, not only their own people but especially the people of the United States—our hyphenated Germans don't need any deceiving, they are born deceived—was that the Lusitania carried enormous quantities of high explosives.

Judge Mayer, in his decision, states: "The proof is absolute that she was not and never had been armed, nor did she carry any explosives." All she carried in the line of war material were 125 empty shrapnel shell cases without any powder charges, some leather fittings, pouchings and the like, and some cases of safety cartridges. Of these Judge Mayer says, "that none could be exploded by setting them on fire in mass, or in bulk, or by subjecting them to impact."

Now that this atrocious falsehood has finally been disposed of in one of our highest courts, I hope the rascals who have spread this infamous lie from coast to coast will forevermore keep their venomous tongues silent. Two or three German fanatics swore they saw guns aboard the Lusitania before she sailed. These gentry were rounded up, perjured themselves, and got in jail for their false testimony.

Now as regards munitions. Turn to War Cyclopedia, page 180, and you will find that "trade in munitions of war is permitted in international law." The largest munition and gun factory in the world is, or was, Krupps, a German firm, which now, by the way, is turning out plows and steam engines. Germany in the past supplied the world with most of its guns and ammunition. It was Germany who armed the Boer Republic and it was the possession of those German guns and munitions and German influence that prompted the deluded Boer to tackle the British, and enabled him also to hold out as long as he did. During this same war, Germany also supplied ammunition to the British, and the Kaiser, though bluffing the public with the idea that his sympathies were all with the Boers, actually mapped out a plan to crush them and sent it with his compliments to his grandmother, the late Queen Victoria of Great Britain. When the defeated Boer chief scuttled to Europe, the Kaiser refused to see him. Foxy old Kaiser!

This country would have been just as willing to sell guns and munitions to the Germans as to the British, for there is little sentiment in business—those who have the price can get the goods. In fact Germany did buy munitions of war in the United States. The sore point with Germany was that her ships could not get here and carry away munitions, owing to the fact that John Bull's fleet controlled the seas, which enabled British ships to come and go at leisure. So the Germans set up a mighty howl, as bum sports always do when they can't have everything their way, and wanted us to nullify the effect of British sea power, the only forceful weapon that Britain had for a long time, and thus place Germany at an advantage and the British at a disadvantage, an act which would have made us an actual ally of the Hun. In 1912 Germany, too, flooded the Balkans with guns and munitions and no one kicked. The Central Powers during the early stages of the war whined to our government that it was not fair to permit trade in munitions of war on a large scale for the sole benefit of one set of combatants. Our Secretary of State in his reply of Aug. 12, 1915, at once informed them that this view would impose upon every nation a duty to sit in judgment on the progress of the war and to restrict its commercial intercourse with the belligerent whose naval successes prevented the neutral from trading with the enemy. By the way, just think if we had got into a scrap with Japan how the Germans would have poured their guns and munitions, at a stiff price, on our shores and how glad we would have been to have gotten them.

The Germans sent over the Deutschland, a big merchant submarine. It ran the British blockade, reached our ports, and German-Americans, and a good many not German, went wild with delight. If a million Deutschlands had come they would have been still more wild and we would have heard no more of this hypocritical kicking about munitions. Of course, if Britain had been bottled up and we had been selling munitions to Germany, you would never have heard a single croak from the Milwaukee brigade; but directly the munition business pinched the German foot, then there was a howl that reached the skies. The German wants everything his own way, or he shrieks like a whipped cur, for he has never been a sport and "won't play the game." That is why he went into this war not like a man but like a demon and a fiend. Hence the poison gas and flamethrowers and merciless treatment of women, children and prisoners.

Violet says I know that England was the cause of the big world war. I know nothing of the kind. I do know, however, that Germany caused the war, and because she started it, she is now a culprit arraigned at the bar of civilization. Let me advise you who want to know all the facts about this war, not from Allied or American sources but from a German source, to send to Boni & Liveright, Publishers, New York City, for a book entitled, "What Is the German Nation Dying For?" by Karl Ludwig Krause. This will give you all the fundamental war facts, facts which the most diseased minds cannot contort or pervert. Read that book and it will transform pro-Germans into genuine Americans.

Now we have the "Willy, Nicky" letters, which the Kaiser wrote the Czar. This correspondence, which extended over years, has filled the Kaiser-worshippers with disgust. We see the Kaiser, under the guise of friendship, trying to stab the luckless Czar in the back and setting traps for everyone in Europe. We have all the facts from Vienna as to the high-handed acts of that country with little Serbia, all of which were backed up by the Kaiser and his clique in Berlin. All official Germany knows the facts. The war-crazed German people were ready to fight all Europe in 1914 and with infantile fatuity imagined that John Bull and Uncle Sam would keep out of the game until their task was accomplished. Later, Britain and the U. S. were to be crushed. We declined, however, to wait until the world was vanquished and humbled. John Bull, and later Uncle Sam, jumped in to save the world from the Hun, and now that the Hun is conquered and his villainies exposed, instead of showing contrition like a man, and owning up that he was wrong, he swears he was hoodwinked and fooled and victimized, and this, too, by a world that had flattered him, fawned upon him and wished him everything that was good. The seventh deadly sin is to be forever sorry for yourself, and the German full of self-pity, sits in a corner and reviles all humanity because it did not consent to having its throat cut, and spoiling his game of conquest and plunder. Says a New York paper, commenting on the correspondence between the Kaiser and the Czar: "Lord Salisbury, who was England's Prime Minister, we now learn made repeated efforts to create an alliance between England and Germany. The two other members of the Triple Alliance would also have been included and an effort made to bring in Japan and the United States. This would have meant that France and Russia stood together against the world, * * * it would have meant a rough approximation to an actual League of Nations. There can be no doubt that war would have been impossible if such an alignment of the powers had been achieved and maintained; but the Kaiser, with his egomania evidently firmly in the saddle, rejected this opportunity to clasp hands with Germany's strongest opponent and thereby maintain the peace of the world of which he was always boasting himself the guardian." It was about this time that Britain made a present of Heligoland to Germany. Says the New York Globe: "Salisbury may have used it as a sop on the assumption that he was dealing with a man capable of appreciating a friendly act. But he was wrong; he was dealing with an egotist so intensely self centered that the light of reason was not in him and 1914 saw the harvest of the Kaiser's mad sowing."

The famous Karl Kautsky, one of the world's greatest living authorities on Marxian socialism, and who scoffed at the idea that the German people were ready for socialism, was deputed by the present German Government, to go through the German Imperial archives. To his astonishment he found state papers smothered with marginal notes, written by the Kaiser, and these notes have simply set Germany aflame. Helmuth von Gerlach in the Zeitung am Mittag says "that though some of these notes are even clever * * innumerable others are absolutely insane," and it was by the instructions contained in these notes that Germany was to be governed, for the Reischtag was merely a debating society which the Kaiser regarded with contempt. In summing up this matter, this noted German says: "The Kaiser's marginal notes from July 5 to August (1914) are an exact reflection of the catastrophic policy that caused the war." He suggests that the Kaiser needs trying, not by a military or civil tribunal, but by a court of alienists—experts on mental diseases. It is in a lunatic asylum the Kaiser should be put. A young man who harassed his splendid father in his dying moments, who threw Bismarck, the man who made modern Germany, into the discard, and who has done other innumerable acts that show an unbalanced mind, and who finally plunged civilization into the abyss, should have no sympathy from honest, decent men of German blood, here or abroad. It may interest Violet and other German sympathizers to know that the Iron Chancellor Bismarck wrote his memoirs in three volumes. Two of these volumes have been published. Germany is moving heaven and earth to keep the third one from getting into the hands of the public, but a number of prominent men have read the volume and they and all the world know that it was the Kaiser who was responsible for this war. To blame Britain, Wall Street and the capitalist class is the croak of a lunatic. As a prominent man writing in the New York Times recently said: "The Germans are incapable of realizing that they made the war themselves, that they created the conditions now existing in Germany and elsewhere and that when they clamor for 'justice' and 'mercy' they are using words very recently written into their dictionaries with a pencil." Don't forget that Great Britain and Germany for ages had been the best of friends, until the present Kaiser was seized with his wild dream of dominating the world.

Now digest these facts, cut out this unpatriotic and insane worship of a dead and worthless autocracy. Help to build a modern Germany if you wish, but first of all build in your hearts a temple of loyalty and devotion for the land that has been a paradise for many an oppressed German. To discover that our old, jovial German friend was cruel and merciless, a plotter and a murderer, was a shock to us all, and it will take us a long time to regain our confidence in him, for his deeds have destroyed our faith in our common humanity and left us dazed and stunned. Germany and Russia today are the two great world problems—two unknown quantities. If we knew they were going to evolve into sane, sensible, kindly, human, well-disposed democracies, the world would soon tread the paths of peace, and the nightmare of horror, unrest and uncertainty that now grips us with a chill of death, would at once be lifted.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

HURON, TENN.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Don't you think you have abandoned the cause of the underdog just at the most critical period? You helped to get him up on his feet and because he is celebrating his emancipation a little beyond good reason and good judgment you have turned against him. He is just a little intoxicated with his new found freedom and needs to be studied and advised and he will come around all right if you will just give him a little time.

6,000 More People

Every Day Start Saving Teeth in This Way

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

There is a new, scientific tooth paste used on millions of teeth today. You see them everywhere—glistening teeth, conspicuous for their beauty.

Leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use. Over 6,000 people daily, on the average, write us for a trial tube.

Soon or late all careful people are bound to join these users. But this is to urge you to learn at once what this new method means.

To End the Film

The purpose is to end the film—that viscous film which coats the teeth and causes most tooth troubles.

You can feel this film. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. The tooth brush does not end it. So month after month it remains there, causing stain and tartar and decay.

Film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. All these troubles are constantly increasing, despite the wide use of the tooth brush. And film is the major reason.

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat film. Able authorities have proved its efficiency by countless careful tests.

It is now embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste which meets every dental requirement. And a Ten-Day Tube is being offered to let everyone see what it does.

Watch Your Teeth Whiten

Get this free tube and let your mirror show you Pepsodent effects.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

A new discovery has made pepsin possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has now found a harmless activating method.

And now this efficient film combatant can be every day applied.

Send the coupon for a Ten-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as fixed film disappears.

Compare this new-day method with the old. Then let the clear results decide what is best for you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

The LILIES of FRANCE

by Anna S. Ells

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

JOE Bentley was a huge specimen of a man, with grey eyes hard as flints, a mouth that spoke no tenderness, fists that doubled faster than his slow wits worked, and a shock of waving brown hair any girl might envy. That was before he met Nellie.

Joe's father had been that kind of a man, fast fists, and slow wits; his tiny, frightened mother had quivered into her restful grave before Joe was old enough to remember her. After that his father had "brought him up," and his fists had been more active than his brain in the beginning. It was no wonder that Joe learned early to fend for himself, and to improve upon his pugilistic education.

When he had won the proud distinction of being boss of a gang of men in the city's new subway, he had married, and in marrying, some trace of his little mother's graciousness must have crept to the rough surface of his nature, for he chose a wife as tiny and as sweet as his own mother had been, Nellie Allen, who looked upon him as a god of strength and protection from the hard blows an unkind fate had dealt her. Joe liked being a god of any kind, and his grey eyes grew less hard, his mouth more tender, as the days passed. For a year Nellie held her "Big Bear," as she lovingly called him, in leash; for a year the little home, the first either of them remembered, throbbed with happiness, cleanliness and comfort. Then the baby came. Joe's heart nearly burst with pride, although it was only a wee baby girl, and not the sturdy son he had hoped for.

The weeks passed by, and the little wife did not get strong. The home, once so cheerful, was neglected; the baby wailed in the long, cold nights, for it was winter now. Then the subway was completed, and Joe lost his job.

He took the roll of money that was his due, looked at it strangely, and walked down to the river bank to think. A lethargy that was new to him cowed him. True, there were other jobs, other gangs of men to be bossed, other rolls of money to be earned, though no one was waiting in those days around the corner to force work upon him. That was before our country entered the great war; days when men sought the jobs, not the jobs the men.

For the first time in his life Joe felt the call of the wild; the yearning to throw up all responsibility, and fare free; to get away into something new and strange; to forget the past, and all it held, and start afresh.

Sure, there was Nellie, but she was only a shadow of a wife, always with a pain up her sleeve; and she did not seem to mind him any more; he was no longer her "Big Bear," her god-man. Nowadays it was the wailing baby that held her attention. Her soothings and singings were all for the little one. His home was neglected, his wife lost in the wailings of a sickly baby girl.

Then there were the bills! He should think there were the bills, such bills as he had never known before.

He looked down at his great hands in perplexity.

"Is that all you are to bring me, you great strong things, a half-kept house, a sick wife, and a crying kid? How's a man going to get anywhere tied down like that?"

He looked over the dark, sullen water with an ugly frown.

"Everything I've ever had I've fisted for," he argued. "I'd better be fisting right now, and I think I'll strike out for a fair deal."

He took the roll of money from his pocket, and carefully counted it, although he knew full well just how much there was. For a time he looked, unseeingly, out over the dark waters of the river, his heavy brows bent. Slowly the tenderness crept out of the grey eyes; the stern mouth grew sterner; the great fists closed and opened, and closed again about the little pile of notes upon his knee. Then it was almost as though Nellie and the baby had never been; he returned to the days of his youth when might alone spelled right, and the man who hit hardest was the one who won. Still, he would play fair, for fair it seemed to him. They had joined a partnership, Nellie and he; he had grown tired of it, and apparently she was at least indifferent. They would dissolve into two separate parts. The poor little waif of a baby did not loom large enough to count. Nellie was fond of the kid; let her have her, but he would play fair. He had always treated her right, and he would now. So he divided the roll of bills into two equal parts, sought an envelope, and sent it to the little home, while he took a night train that carried him far away from where Nellie and the baby waited in vain for "daddy's" return.

As the days went by and Joe did not come back, Nellie knew that she was deserted. Her knowledge of his nature told her the bitter truth. But these are not the days when women quiver into early graves when adverse fortune beats and bruises; they have learned to beat back. Nellie, strangely enough, grew strong with her first great bitterness; anger strengthened her arms for unaccustomed tasks.

For a while Joe sent money home now and then. With the first he wrote that he had a big job in the West, and would look out for her and the kid. The second came wrapped in a soiled bit of paper, and the only message was:

"I'm all right. Joe."

Nellie's eyes flashed as she read.

"'I'm all right!' How about us, kiddie? The selfish beggar! We'll show him who's all right."

She clasped her darling close as she made plans. The next day she gave up the little flat, and rented a couple of cheaper rooms.

The third time Joe sent her some money, only ten dollars this time, there was no word at all. After that nothing came, although she had been careful to register her new address at the post-office.

Then came the declaration of war.

To some it was the deluge.

To some it was an open door.

To Joe Bentley it was the latter; for once he would have an opportunity of giving his powerful fists a lawful mission; for once his love of a fight would be commendable. He was among the first to enlist, but he sent Nellie no word.

After that the wheels of time turned methodically. Joe went to France, and Nellie, leaving her baby in a Day Nursery, found work in a munitions factory, and earned more money than she had ever seen before. Then she returned to the little flat that had once been home. Joe seemed nearer there.

For a long time she felt a dulled happiness, but the ache was still hidden in her heart. Sometimes at night, when she was not too weary, she would take it out and cuddle it, for when a woman once loves, a string is touched that never ceases to vibrate: its note may change from love to hate, but it will never be silent again. Nellie had not learned to hate Joe; she knew how big his fists were, and how carefully they had been educated to the neglect of his better self. She, herself, was of the people; poetry and roses held but vague meaning for her; it was the sturdy things of life that counted, the bills and cash to pay them, the hunger and the food to satisfy.

A note of fineness had been touched by her love of the big, burly man who had now deserted her, but even that melted into practicality, the cleaning and cooking, the washing and mending for "her man," the little round that so quietly closes the door to Romance.

The second time that "Love took up the harp of life" was when the baby came. Nellie could never quite understand the strange thrills that had crept over her when she first held the tiny bundle of life close to her heart; they seemed to have fingers that reached out beyond the life she had known into something unfathomable. Even yet she did not understand; she held her love for her child somewhat in awe. It seemed connected in an inexplicable way with a church window she had once seen.

It had been just at sunset long before she had married Joe. People were entering the church, and she, out of idle curiosity, had joined them. Through a stained glass window the sunset light had flooded, bringing out the glory of color and the beauty of The Christ blessing little children. Something had grown big within her breast; her breath had turned to sobs as she fled from the place.

"I felt as though He was going to speak to me," she had whispered to herself in explanation of her flight. Even yet she sometimes wondered what He would have said to her had she waited.

Strangely enough, her fourth glimpse of the beauty of heaven came when she handled the instruments of death in her daily work.

"These things," she told herself in awe, "can

PART II.

"OH, don't talk like that. You were not to blame. Stay here with me. It may be clear tomorrow."

Suddenly his fur-clad arms were about her neck, and, for one swift moment of terror and delight, her face was held against his. Then he released her, almost flinging her from him, and she heard the door close behind him. She sprang to the window with another cry of protest, but already his tall figure was vanishing into the hissing and swirling whiteness that engulfed the world.

Jeffrey forced his way through the drifts with the strength of desperation. A more terrifying fear than that of hunger, even for Jessica, had driven him forth from the shelter of the cabin. Jessica's great blue eyes of virginal innocence, the warmth and richness of her voice and the lovely, rounded lines of her figure had kindled in him such a passion as he had not known for years. He must not pass another night beneath that roof. He could reach the ranch-house in two hours, if all went well and he could keep the cottonwoods in sight. It was apparent already that there could be no thought of return tonight. He would have to wait till the wind died down and horses and men would not be blinded by the flying ice particles. He stumbled forward now with eyes closed for minutes together; then stood still till he caught his breath and a fleeting glimpse of the treetops. Sometimes these appeared on the right, and he knew that he had turned in his blind struggles and was headed away from his destination. Taking his bearings anew, he would forge ahead for a few rods more. This process was repeated over and over, his rate of progress always slower, and the drifts seemingly deeper and more yielding as the minutes passed.

Now, with his hands sheltering his eyes from the stinging blast, he peered through the welter again to locate the guiding line of treetops. He waited for one of the momentary lulls, and slowly turned around in his tracks. He could see nothing in any direction but the whirling and hissing snow-flakes. Then with a curse he turned his eyes to the sky overhead. His worst fears were realized. The sky was blacker than ever, and the snow was falling again in a smothering cloud. The treetops and all other landmarks were blotted out as by the densest of fogs. He could see nothing but the whiteness in a little circle around him, and in the whirl and roar of the storm all directions were alike. The ranch might lie before or behind or on either side. He was exhausted, half frozen and hopelessly lost. He stumbled on again through what seemed years of misery. Through his dizzied brain whirled a vision of his body, stark and stiff beneath an ever heightening drift.

Suddenly he recalled a means of escape. He could follow his track back to the sod-house. This idea, at first rejected as a miserable surrender to circumstance, came back with ever renewed force. After all, the tide of youth flowed strongly through his veins, and today he knew that as yet he had not really tasted life. The wind howled and screamed like a thousand demons, and the cold pierced him like a knife. Back in the cabin there was warmth and life; here he faced a miserable and painful death. He turned and plunged through the snow, along the winding trail he had just traversed.

For hours he struggled onward, now buried to his shoulders in a fleecy drift, fighting desperately for every foot of way, now lurching across spaces where the wind had swept the turf almost bare. The icy particles lashed his face like whips, but the fierce exertion which was the price of his slow and uncertain progress kept his blood racing through his limbs, and fought back the numbness that began to creep into his hands and feet whenever he paused for a moment's rest.

He plunged across another wind-swept space and searched for his tracks in the drift beyond. He could not find them. The wind had filled his trail as completely as though it had roared across it for days. Blindly and desperately he plowed his way through. On the other side he searched again for his trail, but still with no success. Then he made a wide detour, after the manner of a trailing hound that has momentarily lost the scent. His search was now rewarded, and he found himself stumbling forward in his almost obliterated tracks. They led into another huge drift, and when he emerged from this, they disappeared again,—swept from the face of the plain by the ravening blast. On he struggled, with no clue to the direction of the cabin save the wildest guess. His breath came in quick, hoarse gasps, and his limbs moved like the members of some senseless machine. Through another drift and yet another he plunged and crawled. Then, confronted by another wall of snow, he fell giddily forward and lay face downward with his arm wrapped about his head.

When he awoke he was lying on Jessica's bed in the cabin. The short wintry day was already drawing to a close. His hands and face ached and stung with the returning circulation induced by handfuls of snow vigorously rubbed into the half-frozen flesh. Jessica was working feverishly and without a word, her lips set in a straight line of determination.

A delirium of pain, mingled with a frightful weariness swept over him. He lay in a bed of snow and thistles while grinning imps pulled and pushed him about, jeering at his pitiful protests. But as the minutes went by the spines pricked and stabbed him less and less, and at last all sensations were merged in an overpowering drowsiness. He dreamed of ministering angels that brought soft and warm coverings to protect him from the cold blast on a great white plain. At last he sank down and down into a blessed oblivion.

* * * * * *

When his eyes again opened it was to encounter a broad beam of sunlight which came across his pillow from the eastern sky. He sat up and gazed about him wildly, and met the smiling eyes of Jessica who stood in the doorway.

"Well," she said, happily, "you're going to be as good as new."

"Did you bring me here?" demanded Jeffrey.

"I had to. There was nothing else for it. I was watching from the window, and got two or three glimpses of you between the gusts. I thought you could see the cabin, but I guess it was just another snowdrift to you. Then I lost sight of you. The place where you fell isn't more than a hundred feet away."

Jeffrey rolled to the edge of the bed and got stiffly to his feet.

"I guess I'm all here," he said, with a rueful laugh. "Wasn't I a trusty messenger? You had to get out into the blizzard and bring me in like a lost sheep. Lucky for me you're stout as well as plucky."

"Oh, I dragged you in on the little wood-sled. You're so big I couldn't have done it without. But let's not talk about that. It was all like a bad dream. Aren't you hungry?"

"Hungry? Yes. But what about you?"

"Oh, I've had plenty. And there are two more pieces of cornbread."

"Well, then, those two pieces are for you."

"I've had my breakfast, I tell you. And you haven't eaten a thing since yesterday morning."

"Those two pieces are for you. I don't eat any more in this house until we can see there's plenty for you."

"Jeffrey, you scare me when you talk like that. You must need something to eat terribly this morning after all you went through yesterday,—and for my sake, too."

"You'd have had plenty if I hadn't come here at all."

"If you hadn't come you would have died in the storm. Oh, let's not talk about that any more!" And now again there were tears in Jessica's eyes and in her voice.

"Eat your bread,——won't you?" she sobbed.

"No," he insisted, more gently. "If it comes to doing without, I can stand it better than you. Oh, Jessica! You are——"

A loud knock at the outer door and a shrill, feminine voice interrupted him. Jessica rushed to undo the fastenings, and Jeffery began searching for his missing shoes. In an instant the door was flung open and Laura Ballantyne entered, closely followed by Liveryman Nichols, bearing a sack of provisions on his shoulder. Finding the storm over at sunrise, they had made an early start from Cartersville in a box sled drawn by four horses. Now Laura stood aghast at the sight of the young ranchman.

Jessica hurriedly explained to her frowning sister that Mr. Steele got lost in the storm and nearly froze to death, and managed to save his life by finding their cabin. While Nichols bore in the remainder of the supplies Jeffrey was lacing his shoes by the stove, and the sisters were holding a whispered conference in the bedroom. Jessica quickly narrated the events of the past forty-eight hours, dwelling especially on Steele's heroic attempt to reach the ranch-house the preceding afternoon. On her lips the tale became that of a knight-errant, plunging into almost certain death at the call of duty.

Laura eyed her narrowly.

"Did that man make love to you?" she demanded.

Jessica shook her head. She was trembling and very pale.

"He was here with you for most two days, and never said or did a thing of that sort?" questioned the elder sister incredulously.

"Well, faltered the truthful Jessica, "he kissed me when he was going away yesterday."

"Oh! I thought so. I thought he couldn't be quite so perfect as all that. Well, Miss Jessica, you'd better be careful. Do you know he's a married man?"

Jessica's head whirled, and she almost cried out with pain. "Married?" she echoed.

"Yes, married. It's mighty lucky I found out about it when I was at Cartersville. If I hadn't, we might have had a pretty state of affairs. I guess it's bad enough now. That man, Steele, has a wife that he doesn't live with; but she shows up once in a while and makes him pay her bills. She was in Kansas City a little while ago. They know that at Cartersville on account of some checks that come through. He will kiss you good by, will he? He'd better not let me see him. If he comes hanging 'round here again, I'll shoot him."

When the liveryman had deposited the third and final sack of supplies, Jeffrey followed him toward the door, and there spoke to him in a low but earnest tone for half a minute.

"Why, sure! Mr. Steele," responded Nichols, heartily. "I ain't sayin' any different to you nor to anybody else. These Ballantynes are nice folks, and there ain't goin' to be no cheap talk."

"Good!" said Jeffrey. "I thought you'd understand. Now can you manage to get me over to the ranch?"

Laura and Jessica returned to the living-room. Jeffrey said good by, ignoring the marked chilliness in the manner of the elder sister. A moment later he had joined Nichols and the horses were plowing through the drifts toward the ranch-house.

A week passed. The weather was warm and sunny, and the snow rapidly disappeared. Half of it had melted away and familiar landmarks had reappeared when, in the middle of a bright afternoon, the sisters heard the jingle of sleigh bells, and looked out to see Jeffrey Steele approaching in his two-seated cutter, behind a stout and handsome pair of horses.

He drew up at the door and made a bow to the two young women who stood in the doorway. Then, hurrying around to the rear of the sleigh, he drew out a smoked ham, a sack of potatoes and another of coffee, and started to carry them into the cabin.

Laura, however, stood firmly in his path. "Mr. Steele," she said, coldly, "if you are intending to give us those things, I'll ask you to put them back into the sleigh. We can't be beholden to you for anything."

Jeffrey stopped in astonishment.

"Why, Miss Ballantyne!" he said, "I'm trying to return a little bit of kindness that you and your sister did me. And now that we're good neighbors, why shouldn't I?"

"Put them back," said Laura, firmly. "Then you might come in a minute, and I'll tell you why. We don't need to stand here in the wind."

Steele, with a puzzled frown on his brow, complied. He threw blankets over his horses, and hitched one to the clothes-line post. Then while Jessica held the door wide, he entered the cabin.

"Now, Mr. Steele," said Laura, determinedly, "I'll tell you why we don't care to be beholden to you in any way, and why it will be best for you to remain away from here in the future. Don't you think it would have been more honorable—more the part of a gentleman—for you to have told my sister that you were a married man before you started in to make love to her?"

Jeffrey turned first red then white. "Who says I'm a married man?" he demanded, looking from the stern face of his questioner into the wide blue eyes of the younger sister. Jessica was trembling violently, and all the color had left her cheeks. With a swift, furtive motion, she brushed her eyes with the back of her hand.

"I got it straight enough," replied Laura, "and it's mighty lucky I did, I guess."

Steele's black eyes searched the faces of the sisters while he drew several long breaths. On a sudden resolution, he began:

"Well, I'll tell you. Jessica knows well enough how I stand toward her, though I've never spoken of it till now. She'll never come to any harm through me. I had a right to kiss her the way I did the other day, if that's what you mean. And I've got just as good a right to do what I'm proposing to do today; and that is to take both of you over to the ranch-house for a little party we've planned for tonight."

Laura set her lips firmly. "We shan't go," she said.

"Now see here, Jessica," said Steele, looking the younger sister squarely in the eyes, "I'm telling you that this is perfectly all right,—that there is no reason why you shouldn't accept. I'll bring you back safe and sound. I'm giving you my word for it. Now will you come?"

"If you do," blazed Laura, wheeling fiercely toward her sister, "you needn't come back here."

Jeffrey's dark eyes gazed determinedly into Jessica's. "Will you come?" he said again.

Jessica trembled and swayed. Conflicting impulses tore at her heart, and tears poured down her cheeks. "Oh, Laura! she cried. "Why don't you believe him? I know he's speaking the truth."

"If you go with him, you go for good," replied Laura in a low and level tone. If looks could stab, Jeffrey would have fallen dead at her feet.

Jessica made no reply, but after gazing long and fixedly at her sister, she turned and hurried

Compare What You Get

A 35-cent package of Quaker Oats contains 6221 calories, the energy measure of nutriment.

That 35 cents buys six or seven eggs at this writing—about 500 calories. Or about three chops.

Quaker Oats, on this basis, cost about one-tenth what meats, fish and eggs cost on the average. That is, you buy ten times as many calories for each dime you spend.

You can serve five dishes of Quaker Oats for about the cost of one egg, or twelve dishes for about the cost of a chop.

Consider what that means in your breakfasts.

No Food Like Oat Food

The oat is the food of foods. It is almost the ideal food in balance and completeness.

It is rich in minerals which growing children need. As a vim-food it has age-old fame.

Well-advised mothers know that Quaker Oats form the supreme food on which to start the day.

Then why not always serve this master dish at breakfast? Why not cut the cost of that meal, and use the saving for costlier foods at dinner?

There was always great reason for serving oats, but never such reasons as exist today.

As she did so, her glance fell upon an envelope lying in the chair where Mr. Mencke had been sitting.

She picked it up and saw that it was addressed to him and postmarked Cincinnati; also that it was of recent date.

She stood irresolute with it in her hand for a moment or two.

She longed to know its contents, and yet her innate sense of honor recoiled from reading another person's letter.

"I will read it," she at last said, resolutely. "I believe, under the circumstances, I am justified in doing so."

She drew the letter from its envelope, and turning to the signature saw that it was from a noted Cincinnati lawyer, and going back to the beginning, she read the following:

CINCINNATI, JAN. 18, 18—.

"WILHELM MENCKE, ESQ.:

"DEAR SIR:—In reply to your favor of the 12th, I regret to inform you that, unless the death of Mrs. Mencke can be proved beyond question, the property recently left to Miss Violet Huntington, by the late Jonas Huntington, cannot pass into your possession, at least for a number of years. As you say, and rightly, you are next of kin, in lieu of your child, who died in infancy; but, under existing circumstances the property will have to rest as it is, until Mrs. Mencke makes her appearance, or you can bring positive proof that she is dead.

"Yours very respectfully,

"RALPH MIDDLETON."

Violet's face expressed intense wonder as she finished reading this significant epistle.

"It does not seem possible," she murmured. "Papa's brother—Unce Jonas—must have returned to Cincinnati and died since he left. How strange! for everybody has believed him to be dead for years and years. And he has left me some money, it seems—probably because papa allowed him to name me—and Wilhelm wanted to get the power of attorney from me, so that he could control it. That is why he kidnapped me," she continued, light breaking in upon her—"he was afraid I should find it out and go to claim it for myself. Forewarned is forearmed, and I will never sign any paper for him again. I will set all my wits at work to get out of this place, and then I will go at once to Cincinnati and claim what rightly belongs to me."

CHAPTER XXXI.

VIOLET'S CUNNING LITTLE SCHEME.

"But," Violet continued, after musing a while, "Wilhelm must not be allowed to suspect that I have discovered his secret. He will probably miss the letter, and come back here to look for it. If he finds it in the chair, he will naturally suppose that it could not have escaped my eyes; he will ask me if I have read it—I am not a good liar, and I do not want to answer any such question. What shall I do with it? I would like to have him find it somewhere else, and then he would not be likely to think that I have seen it."

While she was considering what disposition to make of it, her glance was attracted to the door through which her brother-in-law had just passed.

It had shrunk badly and sagged, so that there was quite a wide crack over the top.

"I will slip it through that crack," Violet said, her face lighting; "it will fall into the hall, and he will think that he dropped it in going out."

Suiting the action to the word, she drew a chair to the door, and, mounting upon it, shoved the envelope through the space with considerable force.

It dropped about midway of the hall outside, and Violet was glad that she had acted with so much promptness, for, not many minutes later, she heard Mr. Mencke's step upon the stairs.

Evidently he was in search of the letter, for she heard him mutter something about "carelessness" as he picked it up, after which he went directly below again.

"Now what can I do to get away from here?" Violet said to herself, as she heard him pass out of the house, "for get out I must, and will."

There were three doors in the room—one leading into the hall, another into the room where Sarah slept, and another opening into a bathroom. There was no outlet from the bathroom, excepting through her chamber, and of course both of the other doors were carefully locked every time any one passed in or out.

There were two windows, but both were nailed down securely.

She might, she thought, write a letter to Mr. Lawrence, break a hole in one of the windows, and throw it out. But she could have no assurance that the missive would ever reach her friend—it would be far more liable to fall into Wilhelm Mencke's hands than into the banker's, while, if it did not, her captors, upon finding the window broken, would suspect why it had been done, and would probably change her place of imprisonment at once; besides, the weather was too cold to live in a room with broken windows.

Sarah was very cautious, and never neglected to lock both doors when she had occasion to open them, although she left the keys upon the outside, knowing, of course, that there was no way for Violet to get at them.

"I have heard that burglars sometimes turn a key from the outside of a door, by using a pair of long, slender nippers," Violet said, as she caught sight of the end of the key in the lock; "but the difficulty in my case would be to get possession of the nippers, and even if I could get out of this room, I might not be able to get out of the house without being seen by Sarah or Wilhelm."

She glanced out of her window just then and noticed a man working upon the roof of a house opposite. He was apparently repairing some leak, and, having nothing more interesting to do, she watched him for nearly an hour.

He completed his task at last, and then raising a scuttle covering, he let himself through the aperture and disappeared from sight.

"I wonder if there is a scuttle in the roof of this house," Violet mused; "if there is, I could get out that way, then I could perhaps slip into some other house by some scuttle and so escape into the street. The first and most important step, however, will be to get out of this room."

This problem continued to puzzle her for several days without any possible solution suggesting itself.

At last, however, one morning, after Sarah had removed her breakfast tray, she went into the bathroom to wash her hands, and, while thus engaged, her glance chanced to rest upon one of the pipes which supplied her bowl with water and she saw that a line of moisture was slowly trickling down its length.

Following this up with her eye, she could see the point where it started and knew that there must be the tiniest possible hole there or the water could not ooze out.

Long usage had doubtless worn the lead pipe thin in the leaking spot, and suddenly a bright idea occurred to her.

"I will make that hole larger," she said to herself; "that will necessitate a visit from a plumber, when I can tell him my story and persuade, or perhaps bribe him to help me get away."

She drew her penknife from her pocket, and, climbing upon a chair, began to scrape gently around the hole in the pipe.

Presently the water began to flow more freely, and, after darkening the spot with some moistened dirt from the floor, she left it. She did not wish to do too much, for fear of exciting suspicion regarding her purpose.

Every little while, however, she would run into the bathroom to watch the flow and was delighted to see the little pools that were collecting about the bowl and upon the floor.

When Sarah came up to replenish the fire and sweep up the hearth, she remarked in an offhand way, though her color was a little brighter than usual:

"Sarah, I noticed that one of the pipes in the bathroom was leaking this morning—did you know it?"

"No," replied the woman, and then muttering something about an "old trap of a house," she went to look for herself.

"I should think there was a leak," she said, returning a moment later; "it'll be bigger, too, afore many hours, and then we shall be afloat."

She bustled out of the room, and a moment later Violet heard her talking with Mr. Mencke in the hall below.

She stole into the bathroom to take another look at the mischief she had done, and found that the ooze or drip had now become quite a stream, shooting out directly from the pipe with considerable force.

With a feeling of exultation in her heart she slipped back to her seat by the window, and appeared to be deeply absorbed in her book when her brother-in-law walked into her room to ascertain the extent of the damage Sarah had reported.

He did not look remarkably amiable when, a few moments later, he hurried out to seek a plumber.

He returned in the course of half an hour, accompanied by quite a respectable-appearing man, whom he conducted directly to the scene of the disaster, where he left him, and then calling Sarah to come and stay with Violet, he told her that he should not return to dinner and immediately hurried from the house.

Violet was delighted with this arrangement, for it seemed to suit her purpose so well, and, thinking that it would be best to make the most of her time, she turned with sudden resolution to her companion and said:

"Sarah, you have been very good to me since I have been here, and I should be very sorry to do anything to cause you trouble; but I am bound to look after my own interests, and I am going to tell this man how I happen to be here, throw myself upon his protection, and beg him to help me back to my friends."

The woman, instead of looking terrified at this bold announcement, as Violet had expected she would, gave vent to a hearty laugh as if greatly amused.

"Miss Violet," she said, at last, as she wiped the tears from her eyes, "you may talk to that man until you are hoarse; it won't do your cause one bit of good, for he is deaf and dumb."

Violet's heart sank like lead in her bosom at this unexpected intelligence, and she remembered now that she had heard no conversation between the two men while they were together in the bathroom.

She was bitterly disappointed, for it seemed as if all her planning had been for naught.

But presently her spirit arose to meet even this emergency.

"Then I shall write what I want to say to him—I am bound, Sarah, that I will not let this opportunity pass. I am desperate, and I will stop at nothing now to regain my freedom."

"No, miss, you will not write a single line," Sarah replied, calmly, but with equal decision, "for the moment you touch your pencil I shall put you in the other room, cold as it is, and tie your hands. I imagine your brother suspected you might be inclined to make mischief, and that is why he brought this dumb Jack here."

"Oh, Sarah! why won't you be good and help me?" Violet pleaded, in a despairing tone, and realizing, all too late, that she should have done her writing on the sly, and said nothing. "You shall be handsomely paid, and I will always be your friend."

"It's no use to wheedle—I shan't break my oath," Sarah said, sharply. Then she added, in a kinder tone: "It's hard luck for you, I own, miss, but my orders are to look after you close today—and I'll be jiggered!" she interposed, with sudden energy, the term being one she sometimes used when laboring under excitement, "if I don't believe that you made that hole in the pipe for a purpose."

Violet assumed a look of mingled indignation and injured innocence at this charge, but she made no reply to it, for her strict adherence of truth would not permit her to deny it.

She went back to her window and took up her book again, as if she was convinced of the futility of her purpose and had made up her mind to submit to the inevitable.

But she could not read a word; her eyes were full of bitter tears, and she had to struggle hard to keep them from falling, for her pride would not let her break down before this relentless accomplice of her wretched captor.

She still had a faint gleam of hope, however.

She had noticed, as the plumber passed through the room that he carried a box of tools, and, remembering the burglar's idea of turning a key with a pair of nippers, she resolved before he went away to see if there was not something among them that would answer her purpose.

She appeared to take no further notice of the man after that, although he had to pass in and out several times; she did not even look up from her book, and Sarah began to congratulate herself that she had thoroughly subdued her charge for that time.

The dinner hour came, and the job in the bathroom was not completed—there was evidently more to be done than was at first supposed—and the dumb servitor went away to refresh and fortify himself for the work of the afternoon.

As soon as he was gone Sarah disappeared to the lower regions, intent upon preparing something unusually tempting for her fair captive, to make up for her harshness toward her during the morning.

The moment her footsteps sounded in the hall below, Violet quietly slipped into the bathroom and began to look over the box of tools which the plumber had left there.

She thought that he must be a Jack-at-all-trades, for there were all sorts of implements in it, and, to her great joy, she found no less than three pairs of pincers of different sizes.

Selecting the smallest of these, she concealed them in her pocket and then went back to her reading with a thrill of triumph in her heart.

When Sarah brought up her dinner she ate it with evident relish, and chatted so pleasantly meanwhile, that the woman regretted more than ever having been so harsh with her.

The dumb plumber returned about one o'clock, and before three his work was finished, and he took his final departure.

He did not seem to miss the pincers that lay so snugly concealed in Violet's pocket, although she had been very nervous while he was there, fearing that he would inquire for them. She felt guilty, too, for having stolen them, but she hoped some time that she would be able to make up his loss to him. And now she only awaited an opportunity to test their usefulness.

Every Tuesday afternoon Sarah usually went home to do the washing for her own family, and Violet was then left alone in the house for several hours.

Generally she was very lonely and nervous upon these occasions, but after gaining possession of the pincers, she could hardly wait for Tuesday to come, and when it did, it seemed as if Sarah would never get off, Violet was so anxious to try the experiment of turning the key in the lock.

a quick, light footfall, and the woman with the proud face and the gray hair swept to Arthur's side, took the candle from his hand, and held it in front of Neil.

Neil gazed at her as though spellbound. The woman's face hardened, and she recoiled as Neil half stretched forth his hands.

"Graceless boy!" cried the woman. "It appears that you have suffered for your past folly. I saw in a paper that you had arrived in this city from the North, and without loss of time I hurried here, arriving only yesterday. Imagine how my heart was torn when I discovered that you had been in San Francisco several days, and had not called to see Arthur!"

Neil drew closer, but the cold, proud woman retreated from his extended hands.

"Do not touch me!" she said sharply. "I shall not come near you until you declare to me that your infatuation for that common creature is a thing of the past. If you are repentant, I can forgive and forget."

Neil drew himself erect and his hands dropped.

"Mother," he began, "I—I——"

He got no further. Suddenly and silently he sank to the floor at the woman's feet.

"My boy! Oh, my son!" Mrs. Preston bent over him.

"It is only a faint," said Arthur. "He has evidently suffered many hardships on account of the general calamity. Now that we have him here, we will keep him until he is once more well and strong. Poor fellow, he was always my favorite cousin, and I am grieved to see him in this plight."

"Better for him and for me," murmured the woman, "that he should die rather than continue to disgrace our name!" It was, indeed, a hard and cruel speech to come from a mother's lips.

"Perhaps," said Arthur, "he has learned his lesson and profited by it. He is young, you know, Aunt Hester."

"Yes, yes," said Mrs. Preston. "We will care for him tenderly until we are able to hear, from his own lips, that the working girl has gone out of his life. He can retrieve himself, but only through contrition and an acknowledgement that he was in the wrong."

Between them, Neil, unconscious and breathing heavily, was carried to a rear chamber and laid upon a bed. A clean, fresh bandage was tied about the bruised forehead, and, some time later, his gentle, regular breathing proved that he had passed into deep sleep.

* * * * * *

Arthur Preston after admitting Beryl and Tonita into the drawing-room and placing the candle on a table, withdrew from the apartment with a significant glance at his aunt. Poor Beryl had not had time to ask a question concerning her loved one; Arthur, as soon as he had opened the door, had curtly requested his two callers to enter, and had ushered them at once into the presence of the haughty Mrs. Preston.

Although Mrs. Preston had been at some pains to see Beryl and make a note of her appearance, Beryl had never before been so close to Neil's mother as she was at that moment. Naturally, she did not know who she was, but the chill of her hauteur wove a foreboding spell about the girls.

"Girl," said Mrs. Preston arrogantly, addressing herself to Beryl, "why have you come to this house?"

"I have come to learn something about Neil," Beryl calmly answered, meeting the elder woman's forbidding look with steady eyes.

"I am Neil Preston's mother," came frigidly from Mrs. Preston, "and I deny your right to ask about him, or even to mention his name. He is not in your social sphere, and you should have the good sense to set your cap for someone in a humbler station."

"Madam!" cried Beryl, her violet eyes agleam and the color surging into her cheeks. "I have every right to call here and ask about Neil. Love levels every barrier—even if a barrier, other than of your own making, ever stood between us."

"You talk of love!" exclaimed the elder woman scornfully. "There is no love on my son's part—merely a passing fancy. Neither is there any love on your part; you are a designing creature——"

"Senora!" interposed Tonita, her quick Southern nature up in arms for her friend, "you speak falsely, for no woman ever loved more devotedly than——"

"I am addressing Beryl Grayson, the bindery girl," said Mrs. Preston, with a disdainful gesture that brought fire into the Mexicana's eyes.

"Leave this to me, dearest Tonita," said Beryl to her friend.

Beryl's face was white, but there was a gentle dignity about her, a calmness and resolution which gave her character a new aspect in Tonita's eyes.

"You have pursued my son for months," proceeded Mrs. Preston, with a supercilious air most galling to Beryl's pride, "and you have even persuaded him to go to Alaska, where he almost met his death; not only that, but you have estranged him from his mother and brother, and from all his relatives. Your conscience should prick you for this; yet, instead, you have the audacity to come here, to the home of his cousin, and ask about him. It is well that I am here. I have long desired to talk with you, and my opportunity has come."

She had not asked the girls to be seated; indeed, she did not take a seat herself, but stood during the interview. Even her stony heart was impressed with Beryl's wonderful beauty, for the girl, in spite of her poor clothes, looked a very queen in her injured dignity. But Mrs. Preston saw only evil in the girl's loveliness—the ravishing charm that had beguiled her son and played havoc with his relatives' plans for his future.

All the affairs of life in San Francisco at that time went forward against a background of sullen smoke and livid flame, amid resounding crashes of dynamite, and of a human misery that made night doubly hideous. The most trivial events thrilled with an intensity almost tragic. The good minister had said that the city's plight had brought pride to its knees everywhere; but, alas! he did not know the imperious Mrs. Preston. Heaven itself might fall, but she would still cling to the prerogatives of wealth and power.

"I will not remain longer," said Beryl, with a pride that matched Mrs. Preston's own, "and have you accuse me falsely. I cannot forget, madam, that you are Neil's mother."

"Stay!" cried Mrs. Preston. "You are seeking to make a good match for yourself; no doubt you desire money, in order that you may be freed from a life of toil. I will give you money if you will——"

"Stop!" cried Beryl, her voice shrill with the anguish aroused by what the other's offer implied. "God knows my heart is not for sale; even if it were, Mrs. Preston, it is too late to talk of such an unholy bargain."

"Too late?" echoed the other woman. "What do you mean? Speak! What is there between you and my son that——"

"I am his wife!" interrupted Beryl.

"It is false!" Mrs. Preston almost screamed.

From her bosom Beryl drew her marriage certificate, opened it, and held it before Mrs. Preston's eyes, although not permitting her to take it in her hands.

"There is the proof that I speak the truth. The ceremony was performed this morning, and since then my darling and I have been separated and seeking each other in this stricken city. I ask no favors of you, Mrs. Preston, nor of any of Neil's people; but to him I will prove, by a lifetime of devotion, that he did not do wrong when he clung to me in spite of you. You talk of money, and God pity and forgive you for doing so."

Mrs. Preston was dazed by the revelation Beryl had made.

"If what you say is really true," said she, goaded to a misstatement by her proud, tortured heart, "you will have a hard time finding your husband. He was here, but he left for Oakland, on his way back to Denver. Before you can possibly reach Denver he will be across the continent, ready to embark for Europe."

Despair, for the moment, was aroused by these words, yet Beryl hid her breaking heart as best she could.

"Come, Tonita," she murmured, stretching out her hand; "I knew how it would be if I came here. Come, let us go."

Flashing fierce looks at Mrs. Preston, Tonita placed a gentle, supporting arm about Beryl's waist, and they left the room and the house.

And in that rear chamber, watched vigilantly by Arthur Preston, Neil still slept, ignorant of all that took place in the drawing-room; slept on, with a packet at his breast which proved Beryl's right to vast wealth—and that high station which wealth alone seems able to bestow.

CHAPTER XXIII.

BETWEEN MOTHER AND SON.

"Neil! Wake up, cousin! The fire will soon be upon us, and we must leave!"

It was dawn, Thursday morning, twenty-four hours after the shattering earthquake. Neil had slept the night through, soundlessly, dreamlessly. It was only when Arthur Preston roused him that he started up in his bed with a reproachful cry.

"What is the hour, Arthur?" he asked.

"Thursday morning," replied Arthur, "and this house is doomed; all Nob Hill is going to destruction. However," he added, "I have saved my automobile for this emergency. The soldiers have been confiscating every car they can find, so I ran mine out of the garage and into the back yard, where it has been covered with rugs and things, and completely hidden. I have saved it for my own use, and I think we are going to need it."

To Neil this ruse appeared like heartlessness. Arthur had denied his automobile to the soldiers, who would have used it to save lives and carry the sick and helpless to the hospitals. Then Neil thought of his mother. Her safety was dear to him, and he condoned his cousin's selfishness.

"I have wasted hours," murmured Neil, "precious hours, while the one I love better than all the world is drifting helplessly about this stricken city."

Arthur had started to leave the room, but he halted and gave Neil a queer look.

"You will go with your mother and me to Mount Tamalpais?" he asked.

"No, no! There is work for me here." A sudden remembrance of the packet of papers crossed Neil's mind. "Arthur! I have something here I wish to leave in your fireproof vault."

"I shall have to disappoint you, Neil," said Arthur. "The earthquake undermined the foundations of the vault and jammed the door in such a way that it cannot be opened. Keep your valuables; they would be safer with you, anyway, than in the safe. I have laid out some of my own linen and clothes for you. Get into them while I am bringing the automobile around to the door."

Neil saw the value of the suggestion. His own garments were little better than rags. When he had donned his cousin's apparel, he changed his personal property to the clothing he wore, securing the valuable packet as best he could in the breast pocket of the coat. The sight of the ring, taken by force from the miserable Gorsline, brought his heart into his throat. He pressed the glittering circlet to his lips ere he put it away.

"I shall place it on your dear hand once more, my lost sweetheart," he said to himself. "Patience, patience! Yet, ah, it is hard to be patient when my heart cries so loud for you and I feel myself so helpless!"

As soon as he had dressed he went out into the dining-room, expecting to find his mother. But she was not there. It was his duty to inform her of what had happened, and he should not shirk it, be the consequences what they might. Had not his wound and his exhaustion overcome him on the previous evening, he would have declared his secret then and there.

Food had been placed on the table, and Neil snatched a few mouthfuls of it to fortify his strength against the trials he knew he must face. Then he passed into the hall, into the drawing-room, and out upon the veranda in front. He could see nothing of his mother; no doubt she was in her own room packing her possessions for flight.

The hot breath of the fire was in his face. To the east and south two walls of flame were approaching Nob Hill at right angles. In the street the refugees had folded their miserable tents, and were stealing away to points of greater security.

Coolies in blue blouses, their chattels suspended from a pole across their shoulders, went past at

Little Things That Count

IT isn't always a beautiful complexion or a perfect figure which causes one to think of a girl as pretty or attractive. The little things have as big a part to play as these more conspicuous beauty points. A pretty complexion can't do away with the impression caused by untidy hair, nor a lovely figure undo the unpleasant picture left by soiled fingernails. It is the little things that count, girls.

What are your pet shortcomings? All of us have some. There is, for instance, the girl whose hair is rather uneven and who is inclined to give it a hasty hair-dressing. When little dragging ends fall down behind her ears, or wisps of hair trail along her neck, or a strand loosens and blows across her forehead, she merely says:

GOING OVER THE FACE TO REMOVE VISIBLE POWDER.

"Oh, my hair is such a nuisance. It's every kind of a length. I can't do a thing with it." But she could do a great deal better with it, if she would give it a minute or two longer in the dressing.

After the hair is up in the morning, look it over carefully. This inspection takes only a moment or two. There should be a packet of invisible pins at hand, and every floating lock should be deftly anchored where it will prove the most becoming. The forehead line should be adjusted, by loosening the hair a little here and pushing it back a little there, tiny hairpins fastening it in just the most becoming way. Loose ends in the neck should be gathered up, tucked in and fastened with invisible pins, and the loose hairs about the ears treated with the same care. Where there are many short hairs, the use of a hair-net is desirable. Do not, however, pull the net tight about the head, flattening the hair down until you look like a skinned monkey. Adjust the net lightly over the hair, pin it in a couple of places next the forehead, gather up any fullness of net behind and tuck it under the hair, fastening securely with a pin, then pin the net behind the ears or just above the ears in the way which makes the hair look perfectly natural and not tight and drawn. With a net thus fastened on, you may face any breeze without alarm, for you will look as well-groomed after your encounter as when you leave your dressing-table.

Then do not forget to see that the powder is brushed out of your eyebrows, that your nails are spotlessly clean and well-shaped, that your dress, if of wool, is brushed free of even one wandering speck of dust, or, if of cotton, that it is perfectly fresh and free from wrinkles.

If you will look after these small things, you will be astonished to find how much prettier you seem to have become, though your features and your complexion have not changed a bit. Though let me whisper a secret—when you have acquired the habit of being careful about these little things, you will find yourself taking much better care of your complexion than you ever did before, and paying more attention to the way you stand and sit and how you put on your clothes, and so not only will the little things have been improved but the big things as well.

Answers to Questions

ELLEN.—Your oily hair with dandruff on the scalp will be improved by careful shampooing. Use white household soap shaved—half a bar to a quart of boiling water—and let stand on the stove until the soap is thoroughly dissolved. Take off and let stand until only tepid. Use this liquid to pour on the hair for shampooing. Whatever is left from one shampoo may be kept till the next—it will form a sort of jelly and to this when you are ready to use it you may add a little hot water. Try oiling the scalp the night before a shampoo—using a medicine-dropper and running it along a part in the hair, then along another part and so on until the whole scalp but not the hair is well oiled. Then tie the hair up in a towel and go to bed. In the morning shampoo the hair, dipping it first in warm water and thoroughly wetting scalp and hair, then pouring on a little of the shampoo mixture and thoroughly manipulating the scalp with the fingers. The mixture will make a fine lather. Go all over the hair with it, then squeeze the lather out and rinse; use more lather and so repeat several times. The point to be careful about is the rinsing of the hair afterward. You should rinse many times in hot water, then in warm, and after the hair is perfectly free from soap and clean to the touch, then rinse in cool water and finally in cold. Not getting the soap out of the hair after shampooing will cause dandruff. Using too strong soap will do the same thing, as it cuts the skin of the scalp and makes it rough. If your hair is inclined to be oily—which may be the result of dandruff clogging the little oil glands and irritating them until they do not function properly—let it down and air it when you have time during the day. You can at least do this once during the day and again when you go to bed. And do not sleep with your hair done up. To tone up your scalp, give it a good massage at least once a day. Slip your fingers under the hair on each side of the head—the hair being loosened, of course—and pressing the fingers firmly against the scalp move the scalp back and forward on the skull, then round and round. Repeat at different points on the scalp until the whole head has been gone over thoroughly and is tingling and warm. If you persist in this treatment, shampoo once in two weeks, rinsing very carefully, air the hair once or twice each day, and sleep with fresh air in your room and with the hair either loosely braided or hanging free, I am sure your scalp will soon be in a healthier condition.

RUTH.—You say your hair has been coming out since you had the flu. You probably had quite a temperature and perhaps for some considerable time. This usually affects the hair and causes it to fall out. You need to tone up the scalp, and to look after your general health. Massage the scalp twice daily—see my answer to "Ellen"—get plenty of sleep and eat nourishing food at regular hours. Get as much outdoor exercise as you can. Brush your hair gently every night for fifty to one hundred strokes, and sleep with it hanging loose.

NO NAME.—Since I cannot answer your letter by mail, under the rules of this department, I am omitting your name and assuming that you will know this answer is intended for you. Dark circles under the eyes come from some physical condition which is not as it should be. It is your general health which needs looking after. Do you get enough restful sleep? Are you careful not to overtax yourself nervously? You ought to have eight or nine uninterrupted hours of sleep with fresh air in the room. Drink plenty of water during the day, and try to be careful about your food, and especially about the eliminative functions of the body. Your bowels should move once a day at least, and without using cathartics. Fresh fruit and green vegetables and plenty of water will aid in this. Chew your food thoroughly. Eat oranges daily, if possible—you are in an orange-growing country, so probably this will be a simple matter for you. As to the large pores, wash the face thoroughly at night with warm soapy water, then rinse in several waters, first very warm, then less so, then tepid, and finally dash on cold water. This latter will close the pores, or help to do so. In the daytime do not use hot water on the face, only tepid water. Hot water opens the pores, which is what you are trying to avoid. Cold water helps to close the pores—remember that. But do not use cold water on the pores if they are not clean, because you will close up their contents in them and have pimples.

MOTHER.—I am omitting your name, as you will see. To develop your bust, your whole body will have to receive attention, I think. I wonder how much you weigh. I judge you are somewhat under weight, probably a good deal so. The milk diet would be excellent for you—it usually adds a couple of inches to the bust. To get results you must persevere for two months. To begin, eat one meal a day and that at night. When you are ready to start on the diet, put half-a-dozen prunes to soak in a tumbler of water and let soak over night. In the morning, on rising, drink one or two glasses of hot water, then eat the prunes, chewing them thoroughly, and drink the juice. Fifteen minutes later, drink a glass and a half of milk (don't heat it), "chewing" each mouthful before swallowing, that it may be well mixed with the saliva. An hour later, repeat the amount of milk, and so continue taking a glass and a half of milk every hour until about 3.30, if you begin at 7.30; or until 4, if you did not begin until 8. About 6 or 6.30 eat your supper, and between that hour and going to bed drink two glasses of water. After the first week, drop the evening meal, and drink two glasses of milk every hour from 7.30 in the morning until 6.30 at night, keeping up the water night and morning, and the prunes. Weigh on the afternoon of the last day of each week, to keep track of your gain. I think you will find that after the first two weeks your bust will begin to show signs of development. If you do not take the milk diet, for any reason—though it would be a fine thing for your general health—get some cocoa-butter at your drug store, and use it to massage the bust. To use it, heat it over a flame and rub it gently on the breast with a circular movement, following the outline of the breast. Then gently massage with the same movement. The breasts are very delicate parts of the body, and must not be handled roughly.

E. A. E.—See answer to "Ellen" about hair. I do not think I would wear bangs, if I were you. Why not part the hair on one side, then arrange it so that it lies in a sort of wavy line on your forehead? Here is a good way to do that. Do your back hair any way you like, but before putting it up, part the hair from ear to ear, about half way back from the forehead. What hair is back of the part can be combed straight back with the back hair. The front section should then be parted a little to one side of the middle. Take the left half—this will be the smaller section, as you should part to the left of the center—and brush it back loosely, pinning it to the back of the head where the ends will be covered by your back hair, then loosen it next the part so you can draw part of the hair in a curve or wide "finger" down on the forehead. You can pin the hair in whatever form you find is becoming. The hair next the ear can be loosened a little and pulled somewhat forward to make a soft line, then pinned in place. For the right side of the front hair, divide in two sections, the one nearest the part being only about two inches or a little more in width. Comb or brush this back, then draw it down upon the forehead a little in a curve, pinning in place, while the ends are brought back and pinned under the back hair. The other part of the right side of the front hair should be brushed back and pinned with or under the back hair, but left a little loose by the ear. Watch the illustrations of these articles and you will see pretty ways to arrange the hair. Notice, especially, how the forehead line is softened by letting the hair come a little over on the forehead. You can do that with your hair. Bangs are not being worn, and once your hair is cut it takes a long time to grow out, so if I were you I shouldn't make this experiment. Don't worry about your height.

PUTTING ON A HAIR NET AS A FINISHING TOUCH.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

Don't Spoil Your Hair By Washing It

When you wash your hair, be careful what you use. Most soaps and prepared shampoos contain too much alkali, which is very injurious, as it dries the scalp and makes the hair brittle.

The best thing to use is Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, for this is pure and entirely greaseless. It's very cheap and beats anything else all to pieces. You can get this at any drug store, and a few ounces will last the whole family for months.

Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in, about a teaspoonful is all that is required. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, cleanses thoroughly, and rinses out easily. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and is soft, fresh looking, bright, fluffy, wavy and easy to handle. Besides, it loosens and takes out every particle of dust, dirt and dandruff.

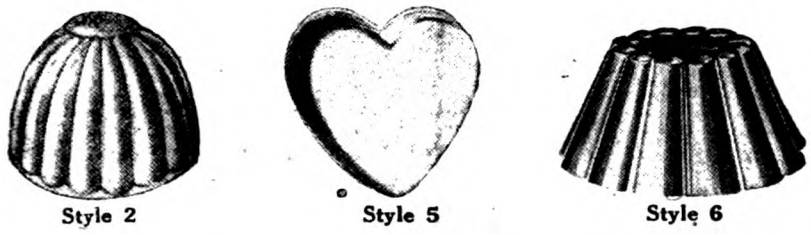
TURN HAIR DARK WITH SAGE TEA



If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody Can Tell.

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome. Nowadays, by asking at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," you will get a large bottle of this famous old recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, at a small cost.

Don't stay gray! Try it! No one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy and attractive.

Condensed Fruit Juice

In a Bottle in Each Package

Jiffy-Jell differs vastly from the old-style quick gelatine desserts. Every housewife should learn what that difference means.

We use no artificial flavors. We crush the fruit, condense the juice and seal it in a vial. A bottle of this fruit-juice essence comes in each package of Jiffy-Jell.

The fruit is abundant. We use, for instance, half a pineapple to flavor one dessert. The fruit is crushed in Hawaii—fruit too ripe to ship.

So Jiffy-Jell brings you real-fruit desserts, rich in fruit, and at a trifling cost. The fruit comes sealed in glass, so it does not lose its fragrance or its freshness.

Instant real-fruit dainties

Fruit is essential. Everybody needs it daily. But that means the real fruit, not a mere flavor.

Jiffy-Jell brings you those real fruits in plenty. It comes ready-sweetened and acidulated, so you simply add water. Then add the fruit-juice essence from the vial and let cool in molds.

One package will serve six people in mold form, or twelve if you whip the jell. All with a rich, fruity dainty at a little cost.

The Jiffy-Jell itself is acidulated with another fruit acid—either lemon or grape—in evaporated form. So you get two fruits in each dessert.

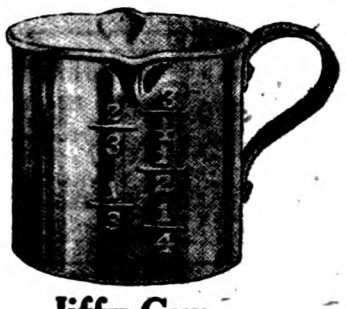
There is also Lime-fruit flavor to make a tart, green salad jell. Also Mint flavor to make a mint jell to serve with meats or as a side dish.

Compare with old styles

Millions of housewives now use Jiffy-Jell, and we want every home to know it. So we make these offers to induce a test.

Compare Jiffy-Jell with the old-style quick desserts. Learn what these real fruit juices add, in this condensed form, sealed in glass. They come in Jiffy-Jell alone.

Order a few flavors from your grocer, including Loganberry, Pineapple, Lime and Mint. Then send us the trade-marks for any gift you want.



One trial will make you forever a user. That's why we make these offers. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget, and order the Jiffy-Jell now.

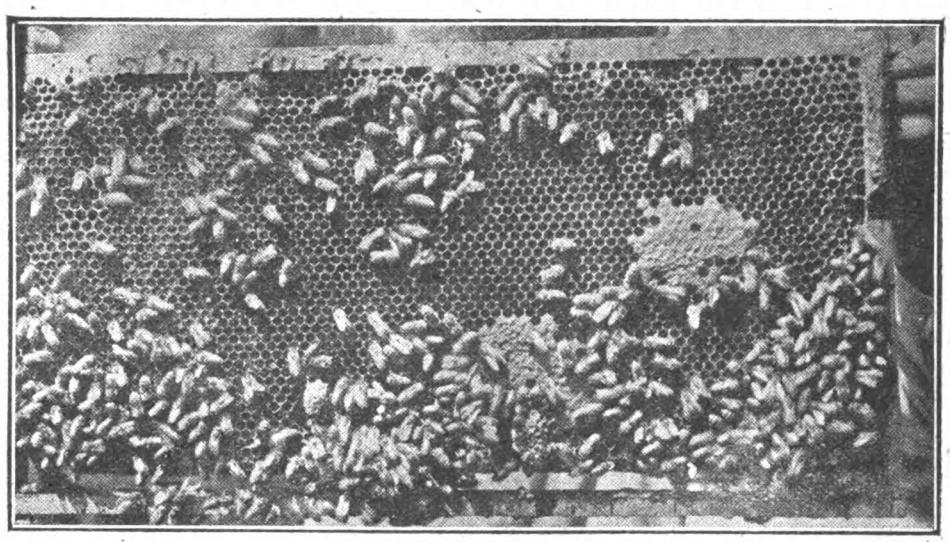
Profit in Keeping Bees

By William Beucus



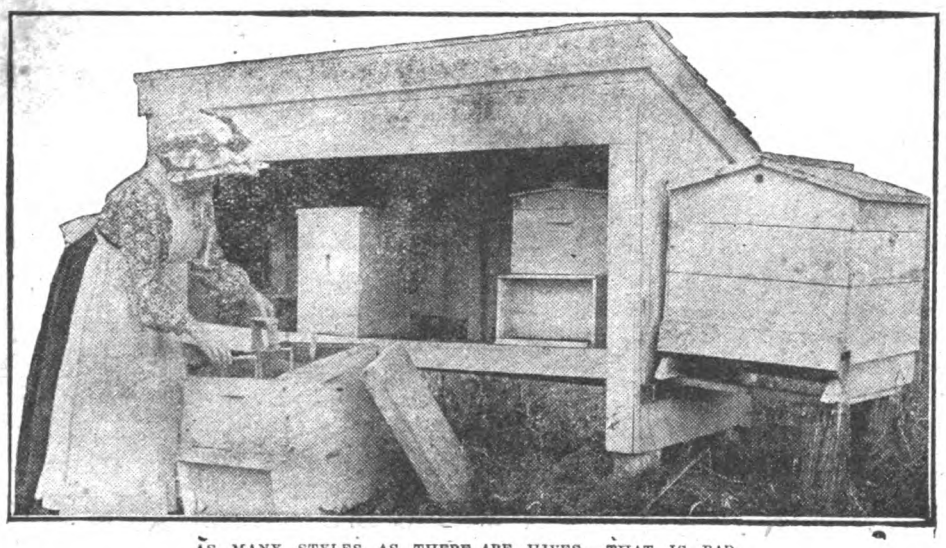
Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Helps for The Beginner

If you were to ask one of the more intelligent, progressive, up-to-date farmers if the honey bee is of any importance or use about the farm, his reply would be something like this: "Yes Sir-ee! the little honey bee is one of the most useful little animals in the world. Useful to the farmer; useful to the city dweller. Our entire social structure has agriculture as the base upon which it rests. If the factories, the stores, the wholesale houses of the cities, and the railroads which unite them with the country, were to disappear, civilization would decline and we would live in an exceedingly primitive condition; but we could still live because we would still have agriculture. But let agriculture, the source of food, disappear, and human life would almost entirely vanish. But agriculture is in part dependent upon the little honey bee. We would have very small crops of currants, gooseberries, blackberries, raspberries, cherries, plums, crab-apples, apples, etc., if there were no bees to carry the pollen from one flower to another and thus make certain the fertilization which results in fruit. Dairying is dependent upon clover; and clover is dependent upon bees for cross-fertilization of flowers and consequent production of seeds. Corn and potatoes would not produce so heavily if there were less clover to assist in building up the fertility of the soil. It is well known that cucumbers cannot be profitably raised in the absence of bees. Thus the little bee occupies a niche which cannot be filled by any other animal."

Now, here, someone will exclaim: "Yes, but what about the bumble-bee. It fertilizes red clover; and the farmer relies upon red clover more than upon any other for fertilization of his land, to say nothing of the crops of hay." The mistake made is in assuming that all of the fertilization of red clover is performed by the bumble-bee. The honey bee, particularly the Italians and the cross between the Italians and the black or German bee, called hybrids, does work on red clover. It does not get much honey from red clover, excepting in rather dry years, because its tongue is a little less than a quarter of an inch long, while the tongue of the bumble-bee is about half an inch long. But the honey bee gets pollen and some honey from the red clover and in doing so carries the little grains from one head to another and thus cross-fertilizes them. Examine a few red clover flowers next summer and see where the pollen is; and notice, too, that a bee cannot work on the flowers without becoming dusted with the pollen. Watching fields of red clover has led me to believe that there are not enough bumble-bees, at least in the northern states, to do more than fertilize a part of the red clover blossoms.

Now, I have no doubt that a good many of the readers of COMFORT would like to have me help answer the question: Would it be advisable for me to keep some bees? Well, if your only thought is to make money out of bees; if you do not really care for the bees themselves; if you have no real hankering for bees; if you have no strong desire to make the bees comfortable, prosperous and happy in their little homes, do not become a beekeeper on either a large or a small scale. Success and happiness come to those who do not care for the bees simply to rob them, but to make the bees themselves happy. For example, my own success has been due largely to the enjoyment of handing over to a colony in the fall several broodcombs full of sealed honey. The bees will not waste an ounce of it, that is certain. They will not starve and it is almost certain that no dysentery will appear. And when spring comes how pleasant it is to see one after another of my colonies bob up, ready to roll in the honey.



BEES FILLING COMB WITH HONEY.

Last fall, a lecturer, a very successful beekeeper, spoke something like this: "Are you sure that your bees are comfortable for the winter? When I lie comfortably tucked up in my warm bed and I think of some colony which may not have been well enough cared for and may be suffering from the cold, I feel uneasy." I knew then why that man was successful. Now if you feel that way toward living things; if you are sure you would feel that way about bees, go to it. Get one colony and feel your way along.

"But how can I tell whether or not bees will do well in my locality?" In the vast majority of places, bees will make a living and give some surplus. My first bees were kept on the roof of a flat in the very heart of Minneapolis, in the same block in which the public library is located. Strange as it may seem, they did very well indeed. Every state in the Union has its many beekeepers, large and small. In our northern states, there are extensive beekeepers who number their colonies by the hundreds and the same may be said of the southern states, east and west. Even in arid New Mexico and Arizona may be found extensive beekeepers. Wherever there are flowers, bees may be kept.

"Well, now, what is it going to cost me to get started?" That is hard to answer definitely for each, because the conditions are so widely unlike in different parts of the country; and because individuals are so unlike. My own experience may into the bedroom. Jeffrey stood by the window, waiting.

When Jessica reappeared a moment later, wearing her hood and cloak, he turned toward the sisters with a broad and happy smile. "Well, I'm a lucky man, after all. The girl who'll take my word when all the appearances are against me is the girl for me. Now here! I'll show you both something."

Drawing a paper from his breast pocket, he unfolded it and threw it on the table.

Laura picked it up and read slowly to herself, her lips moving with the intensity of her attention. Then she exclaimed:

"This is a letter from the chief of police at Omaha. Does he mean that your wife's been arrested for forgery?"

Jeffrey smiled.

"He means that the clever lady who did me the honor to pretend to be my wife while she passed a number of checks has been arrested. Some people who knew me in a business way took the checks in good faith, and it has cost me about five hundred dollars so far. She claims, I believe, that she is not guilty of forgery since the name she signed was Mrs. Jeffrey Steele, and no such person exists. Still, if I can have my way, and I think I can, she'll go to the penitentiary just the same."

"And you aren't married at all?" gasped Laura.

"Not in the least."

"Oh, Jessica!" cried Laura, "how foolish and cruel I was!"

Jessica turned toward her with glowing face and outspread arms. Both the sisters had tears in their eyes. In a moment each was crying softly on the other's shoulder.

For five seconds the tall young ranchman played the part of bystander. Then his long arms proved perfectly capable of embracing the two sisters at once; and he bestowed a hearty kiss which was evenly divided between two happy, tear-stained faces.

just go alone by yourselves and count the many blessings God has given you, the biggest, richest and grandest one of all being health and strength. You are able to get around, to go everywhere you wish to go—able to run, climb, sport and enjoy yourself to the utmost; able to eat plentifully of anything you desire and can sleep like a babe all night. Life is sweet to you in many ways, you have all the things essential to make you happy. Go out under the stars tonight, my dears, and gaze into heaven and reflect deeply upon all these glorious privileges you enjoy—then—let your thoughts wander to dear Uncle Charlie who has not enjoyed a night's sleep nor a square meal for many years. He cannot even walk, let alone run or climb or sport. Every breath he draws is one of pain. His poor body is racked with physical suffering, impossible for the healthy to understand.

Being "celled" up in that big, noisy city, he sees not the glory of the rising sun nor the majesty of its setting. Neither the splendor of soft moonlight nights, nor the beauty of the stars as they unveil their faces at eventide. The freedom and pleasure of God's great out-doors is denied to him, and oh, how his great poet soul does crave for these things! How he loves the wild, and all God's creatures!

Lying on his bed of pain he cannot feast his eyes upon an ever changing panorama of nature. All he sees is the city streets and the narrow confines of his room. All this he endures with glorious Christian fortitude, with humble patience and resignation, and out of his affliction he sheds his love upon all the human family. From his bed of pain a corona of Light radiates to all parts of the world, brightening and warming all souls which it touches. He loves everybody. He crucifies himself in his efforts to do good to poor, blind, erring, miserable humanity. He is filling his mission here in this world as the Almighty ordained him to do it and he is doing it nobly, well.

Aren't you going to awake from your "sleeping sickness" and hustle that home for Uncle Charlie?

Just think, if the gigantic strain on his poor nerves during the war had taken him away! What if he had fallen a victim to that dread disease, influenza.

I tell you, readers, delays are dangerous. Our Uncle Charlie has now reached that age when each year is a precious jewel slipped off the cord of life. He cannot be with us so very many more years so let's all try to get that home for him to rest in, the remainder of his days.

Come on now, my hearties! Let's see how quickly we can raise money enough to buy a nice home. Let's resolve that Uncle Charlie will be established in his own "home sweet home" by early summer.

God bless you all. GEORGIANNA F. WARNER.

VICKSBURG, MISS.

DEAR EDITOR AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have a plan I would like to get started at once. It is this: Let each of us COMFORT sisters get busy and make "that home" for Uncle Charlie a certain thing. We can do it I know if each one will do her bit. Let us divide ourselves into two classes and let one part give a cash contribution, from a dime to as much as they can and let the others agree to make one thing to sell and give the money to the fund, or they can do some sort of work and turn the pay in for the same purpose.

I will make four pretty little tea aprons and sell them at fifty cents each and give the $2.00 as my part.

The home does not have to be a fine or an expensive one but it could be a very comfortable one and just think what that would mean to him. I am a believer in giving flowers to the living while they can enjoy them. A new home now will do him more good than an expensive stone at his head when he has left us. Let us work while there is time.

Love to the dear COMFORT staff.

Sincerely, MRS. N. B. HENDERSON.

Sometimes money is sent to us to pay for subscriptions for the benefit of worthy persons who are unable to pay the price. If any sister will send us the name and address of a deserving person who would like to receive COMFORT but cannot afford to subscribe, I will see that it is placed on our waiting list to be given a subscription when donated funds become available for that purpose.—Ed.

DECATUR, ILL.

GOOD EVENING MRS. CONDUCTRESS, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN:

Yes, "gentlemen," although only two—another old bach and myself, daring to carry heads erect—making good the old aphorism, slightly modified, "Fools rush in where angels," married men angels, "fear to tread," as a linguistically versatile sister from N. J. recently remarked.

Quite a homey, motherly letter that of Mrs. Walter Alverson, Detroit, Mich., and how gratifying it must be to hubbies to have their wifies acknowledge their ownership of them by signing themselves with their hubby's given name, and then, woman like, to have her spoil it all by favoring us with a sly peep at her little old family skeleton—the wifely money question!

Mrs. Vesey, the idea of your giving me such a backhanded, deadly hatpin thrust after my counting on you as an able ally. Surely "frailty thy name is (married) woman." And yet she "acknowledged the corn" very handsomely.

Mrs. Married Lady from Sullivan, Ill.—Getting pretty close to home—your happy home symphony was all very beautiful but it lacked the staccato of baby voices. Better it, I beg of you, if you have to take into your home and heart one or two of the many homeless "war babies" crying for homes that are not.

Terpsichorean lady who questions the propriety of living with her elderly husband whom she has ceased to love, and longing for her old career, don't "gag at a gnat and swallow a camel." Observation and open confession of interested parties themselves convince me that if your scruples prevailed ninety per cent of our homes would be out of business. How many hubbies and wives where I've "boarded around" have confessed to me their reverence for God-given parental love which held their homes together when mere tolerance had replaced sex love for their mates. Don't you do it.

Don't any of you uns tell her I told you but Miss B., land of Goshen, California, actually had the assurance to send me her snapshot upon the very thin pretext of showing probably her possession of the seventeen matrimonial scalps she boasted—really hoping by long-distance fascination to secure another scalp to even up her dozen and a half. Not on your life, Cleo. Tote out that little old asp of yours and get busy. Your Octavius has ariv.

Oh, Mrs. Wilkinson, that "pipe dream" of yours! Me, I, a Benedict, with a little wifey all my own and being "trained," I, who have always trained! And oh the nightmare implication of my walking the nightly floor with a squirming, squalling, red-faced, bald-headed bud of humanity, as I've known being done! Dante in his subterranean excursion never "seed" nothing to compare with it.

Lean over this way a bit, Mrs. Old Subscriber from sunny Tennessee, and let me put the laurel wreath upon your brow. Any married woman of your sense and tact and honesty is fit to reign with kings or, better, these democratic days, to queen it over an American home with hubby and kiddies and all most worth living for. The divorce question and that of married martyrdom would soon lapse into innocuous desuetude were all your married sisters of your evident sense and poise. BACHELOR BILL.

Bachelor Bill.—One of the most tiresome persons to meet is he who persists in bragging about his appendicitis operation—when you want to tell him all about yours; the other is the conceited male person who thinks that every woman who looks at him twice has matrimonial designs upon him. Now, Bill, please don't be that kind of a person. If you are I shall repent of my "pipe dream" regarding you for I wouldn't want to "wish" you onto my worst enemy—you know, the one who says about you, "Yes-s-s-, she's a good woman, but—I'm kinda sorry for her husband." —Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

After reading the January number of COMFORT I feel like saying something for Uncle Charlie's Home Fund. We owe our thanks to Mr. Ellis and Mr. McDonald for calling our attention to the work in hand. How thoughtless we sisters have been, but we aren't going to be any more, are we? Let's give what we can and show our appreciation for him now. See what he has done and is doing for the good of humanity. If you can't give much, give a little. He will appreciate that. I'm sending my mite now. SADIE PRINTZ.

HANGEN, WIS.

DEAR SISTERS ALL:

I tried the door once but found it fastened on the inside, so have waited long for courage to try again.

I have taken COMFORT since I was thirteen years old and that has been fourteen years. I have been married nearly eight years and have one child.

I used to be a next door neighbor to Pearl Vesey but she has left old Wisconsin so we are neighbors no more. That is, there was one county between us but that's neighbors in the Sisters' Corner when we are all scattered so, isn't it?

If any of the sisters who joined Pearl Vesey's E. E. D. circle read this and happen to have the budget I would be glad if they would please return the pictures to No. 2. Pearl wrote she could get no track of the budget at all. They were pictures I should like to keep.

Will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson.

DEAR SISTERS AND BROTHERS:

Your publication has for years been all to me that the name implies and I would like to ask the Sisters and "Brothers" (quite likely the men can answer this more satisfactorily than the ladies) to give me their opinions to the following questions as so much depends on the answers that I receive and may be a help to other sisters who have wondered over the same problems.

To begin with I will give you some idea as to my personal appearance, being five feet and four inches in height, weight between one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and thirty, dark hair and grey eyes. This isn't much in my favor but may help you to know me. The worst of all, I am a divorcee. You cannot hate this more than I. A position, I think, every girl is ashamed to be placed in.

After my divorce, I returned to my mother and for a long time never went out with men, being afraid people would talk if I began keeping company too soon after regaining "my freedom."

What I really wish to know is:

Do men ever have a pure love for a girl who has been divorced and have they the same respect for her that they do for a girl who has never known matrimonial troubles?

Are they so prejudiced or suspicious, they are afraid the "divorcee" could not be as dear a mother and a lover of home as the other girl?

Probably this feeling against the divorcee depends on the circumstances which brought about the divorce; still we should not all have to suffer the same as the

Summer Clothes for the Little Children

Batiste Dress with Filet Trimming

DRESSING the children daintily in spite of the scarcity and high price of Hamburgs and laces is not at all impossible to hand-workers who love to crochet or use the tatting shuttle.

These forms of decoration and also smocking and cross-stitching are so popular for little folks' things that ready-made dresses even have at least a touch of hand work.

Filet Yoke and Beadings

Little dresses of either white or colored material may be made very attractive by the addition of filet yokes and beading at the waistline and to finish sleeves.

WILD ROSE FILET INSERTION.

open a human body, and let its soul out, and I, little Nellie Bentley, am helping to make them."

Long she pondered over the horror of it; then she began to read the papers, to listen to the voices of the people. Belgium, desecrated wives and mothers, ruined homes, mutilated babies! She thought of her own dimpled darling. No, the horror was not here; it was over there, and these weapons of life and death which she was helping to fashion were for the healing of the nations.

"I am working with God," she whispered softly. The thrill of her heart swept her like a mighty wind.

Joe? Nellie never doubted that Joe had found work for his powerful strength. Well she knew his unrest; well she knew how the clarion call from Over There would appeal to Joe.

* * * * * *

It was on a battlefield of France that Joe Bentley awoke to the dignity of the work of his mighty hands. They had been marching all night to a new field of operation, one as yet untouched by the barbarian, war. Just as the sun came over the tops of the trees on the little hillside, it rested in glory on a field of lilies, the lilies of France.

Joe, big, uncouth, weary with the night's marching, looked at the pure beauty of that field of wonder, and something stirred within his breast that he had never known before. Among the nodding lilies he could see Nellie's face, and the helpless, precious burden that she carried in her arms. He glanced around shyly at his companions; they were all strangely silent as they gazed.

Joe was not a Catholic; it is doubtful if he had ever given any religion a serious thought, but he made the sign of the cross on his forehead with his hand, as he had seen others do, as he gazed, for he had a feeling that God was there.

Later that day he saw that field of lilies once again; it was all crushed and broken, and the whiteness of the lilies was lost in crimson stain. A great feeling of desolation crept over him.

"Where is God?" he whispered fiercely, his great fists doubling at his sides. He wished that he had written to Nellie.

The great war rolled over more than the lilies of France. Day after day Joe fought bravely; was wounded; in the hospital, then back in the field to fight again. First he had been Joe Bentley, private, then he had crept up the ladder until he could write Lieutenant Bentley. Yet he felt only a dull pride in his achievements; he had done something, but not enough. Those blood-stained lilies still called for sacrifice.

Back in her tiny sitting-room, Baby Bess on the floor at her side, Nellie read of the courageous deeds of Lieutenant Joe Bentley and his men, and she knew that she had news of her husband. Her heart thrilled as she read; it was "her man" who had been brave. Unconsciously she connected his deeds of valor with the glory of the sunset lights from the great church window; she felt that she had touched something holy. She put a hand to her heart to stop its throbbing.

After that her daily work took on graver meaning. She must fill the hands of "her man" over there. Once more, though separated by thousands of miles, they were working together. The bitterness in her heart was giving place to love again, the love that cannot die, but often gets mislaid.

Then came the awful day of The Marne, when thousands of brave men tasted death that Victory might push aside the horrors of war. There were no lilies of France that day; beauty had died, that Peace might live.

When the darkness came down over the battlefield, Joe, Lieutenant Joe Bentley, lay huddled under the stars that knew no war. His body was broken and useless, but his soul had glimpsed into the Great Beyond, and it was very glad.

He had fallen into unconsciousness before the stretcher-bearers found him. He roused only long enough to whisper brokenly:

"The lilies——I helped—to make—them white."

Of course, they did not understand, but nothing seemed strange on the battlefields of France.

Long were the days when he must lie still and let others do the work he called his own, but in the nights, when pain would not let him sleep, he remembered, not the grotesquely tortured faces he had seen, not the long, rough roads he had wearily trod, not the skulking enemy he must make his own, but the nodding lilies, pure and white, touched with the glory of the rising sun.

"Victory is going to be just like that," he assured himself. "There was something more than lilies in the field that morning. Maybe God is up in the heaven as they say, but I know that He comes down to earth when we need Him bad enough. He was there among those lilies; I know it; I felt Him in my heart."

When they told him that he could not go back to the battlefield again he passed one of the bitterest weeks he had ever known; then he began to plan to return to Nellie and their child. They did not seem so far away to him; in his weakness he often thought Nellie was bending over him. He would reach out his one bandaged hand toward her, but she always slipped away. As he grew stronger he knew that she would not come to him. He had left her; it was he who must return. He could not write, for the great hands were helpless now; one he would leave behind, and the other was still swathed in bandages; so he waited, growing strong within, though he was weak enough still without.

Did you hear the bells aringing, all in tune? Did you feel the throb of nations in the air?

Over the battle-scarred land, across the seas where the heart of every nation sang with gladness, swept the peal of the bells. The wolf of war was slain and Peace reigned once more over the land. Never had the bells such a story to tell! Never had they rung into the world such a message of joy!

Lieutenant Bentley listened to the wild cheers that came through the windows near his cot. He looked down at the one great fist left him, now free from its bandages though scarred, and smiled happily. He had helped to ring the bells! Once again he saw that field of nodding lilies; they were lifting their bruised heads, and shaking away the stain.

Across the great waters, Nellie paused in her work to listen to the pealings of the bells, and to the mighty cheer that went up from her fellow-workers. Amidst it all, her heart went out to Joe, her Joe, as she crowded out into the sunlight with the throngs of wildly excited people.

"Peace has come!" they cried; it seemed that the very heavens would be rent with their cheering. That which they had once held in the hollow of their hands, and counted as of little worth, now filled them with infinite gladness.

"Peace has come!" sang the bells.

Then across the ocean came the hospital ships, bringing the heroes home, men who had fought to make peace holy; men who had fought to make us free.

It was Easter in the Great Year of the New Peace. Listen to the singing of the bells!

Down the familiar, narrow street came Joe Bentley, Lieutenant Joe. Tip-tap went the crutch that assisted his wounded knee as he hastened along. In his great heart first a song of gladness mingled with the pealing of the bells, then a shiver crept after, for Nellie might not be glad to see the deserter back; Nellie might not know that he had helped to rescue the lilies of France.

Up the stairs softly tip-tapped Joe. The door was standing open; he could hear Nellie's voice as she sang to her child:

"——the beauty of the lilies——"

Joe caught his breath quickly as the sweet words floated down to him. Did Nellie know about the white lilies, the lilies of France, after all? He waited for the next words.

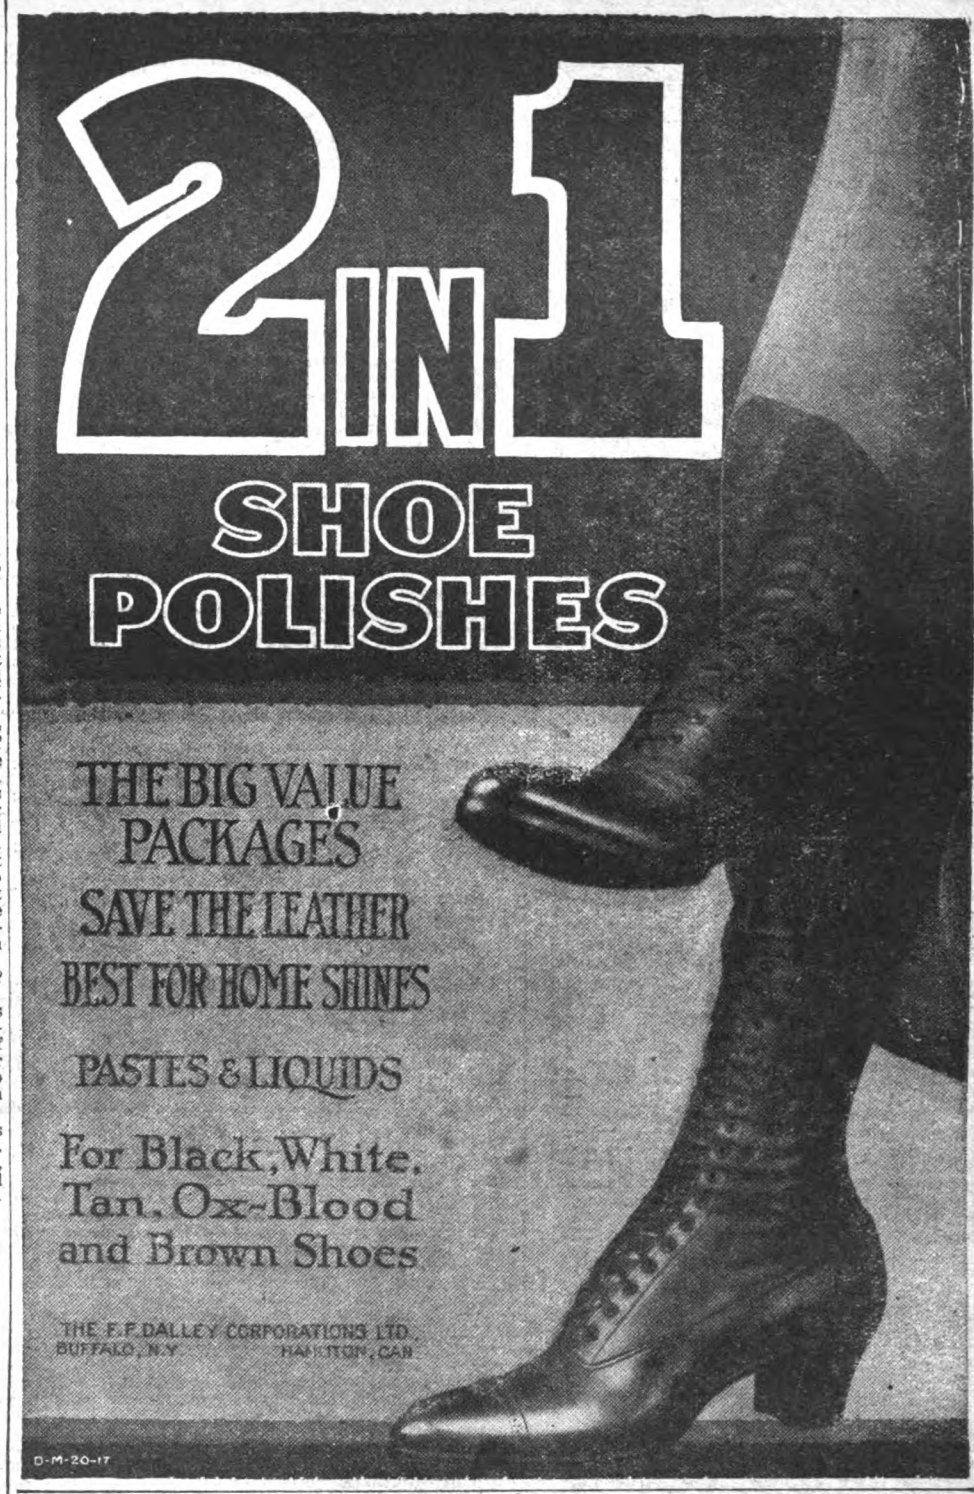
"He died to make men free."

A moment later Joe stood framed in the doorway, his thin face drawn and white. His armistice still awaited signature.

Then Nellie saw him. With a glad cry she sprang forward, then paused, her eyes holding him. Private Joe was her man; she dared no familiarity with the soldierly Lieutenant Bentley who saluted from the doorway. She waited for him to speak.

"Nellie, girl," he said, "when I left you and the baby yonder I was a craven coward. I'll never be a coward again, my girl, and I've learned what love is; but it is for you to say whether you will take me back or not. Wait!" as she sprang forward. "I've been over there, as maybe you know. I am lame for life, and one arm is gone; but I did my bit. They made me Lieutenant Bentley, and there's a medal you may like to see. Oh, Nellie girl! It was your face I saw in a field of lilies one day, and then I knew all that I had lost. Can you ever forgive me, and take me back, me a broken man, but loving?"

With a little cry Nellie folded him close in her strong young arms.



Above her bended head Joe saw the field of nodding lilies, once more pure and white.

For Nellie the sunset glories of the great church window filled her tiny home with a radiance divine.

Thus again the splendor of the sunlight touched with wonder the white lilies of France.

Do you hear the bells aringing?

"Glory to God in the Highest! Peace has come!"

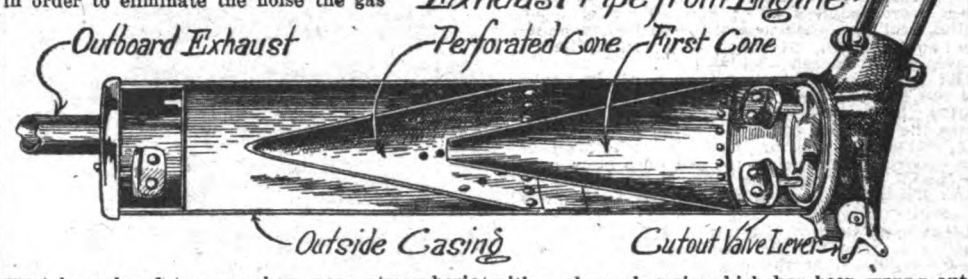
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.



The Muffler

THE explosion inside the cylinder which forces the piston down to deliver power to the crank-shaft is an expansion of gases. It is a well-known fact that if an explosion takes place in a confined space, the escaping gas will be of a higher pressure than the surrounding air and the noise created will be proportionate to the difference in the two pressures. Take as an example a revolver of 22 caliber and another gun of 45 caliber. Needless to state that the report of the 45-caliber weapon is considerably louder than the one from the 22-caliber gun. This is due to the difference in the pressures when admitted into the surrounding air.

The explosions in the internal combustion motor create gas of great pressure which must be released from the cylinder so that it might go on with its work. This high-pressure gas has served its purpose in the motor and is, therefore, turned loose into the air.

When it is considered that for average driving anywhere from 600 to 1200 explosions to the minute might take place within the cylinder, it will be appreciated why most cities and towns object to the noise and have made laws which require the use of mufflers in connection with all internal combustion motors.

As above stated, the noise is due to the difference in the pressure of the gas and the surrounding air, and it therefore will not require much logic to understand that in order to eliminate the noise the gas must be reduced to somewhere near atmospheric pressure. This is exactly what the muffler does.

In the accompanying illustration is shown a cross sectional view of a muffler. It will be seen that there are two cones inside the main shell. The gas is admitted into the first cone and then passed along into the second cone. The only escape for the gas from this cone is through the series of small holes which break the exhaust into a series of streams and thereby bring the pressure of the gas somewhere near that of the surrounding air.

Mufflers have been perfected so that they very efficiently handle the exhaust gases. The sound of muffled gas can be compared to a hiss.

Many trucks of long wheel base are not equipped with mufflers. In lieu of a muffler, a long exhaust pipe is used and a series of small holes drilled in the pipe near the end. The end of the pipe is usually pinched almost together so as to reduce the opening and insure the breaking up of the high pressure by compelling much of the gas to escape through the small openings.

It has become common practice to equip modern cars and trucks with muffler cut-outs, but not to connect them so they can be operated from the driver's seat. The reason for this is that it has been determined by tests that no additional power is to be gained by not passing the exhaust gases through the muffler. The muffler will handle the gases from all but very high-speed motors without any appreciable back pressure. Practically the only reason for installing the cut-out is that it assists the mechanic by cutting out the muffler so that he can determine by the reports the operative condition of each cylinder.

Care of New Cars

It is human nature for the owner to take exceptional care of anything new. However, the owner often will injure the finish of a car when in his own belief he is taking the best of care to preserve it. Factories at this writing are greatly behind in production and in a great many instances bodies are allowed to leave on which the paint is not thoroughly hardened. In little time dust will settle on the finish and frequently the owner will wipe it off with a soft cloth. This practice will injure the finish and should be discouraged. Dusting the new car will invariably scratch the finish and it can never be worked out. There is but one safe and satisfactory method of getting rid of the dust and that is to run it off with a slow stream of cold water. Allow the water to soften the dust and it will run off. The body can be dried with a clean chamois which has been wrung out of clear, cold water. After the body has been washed several times in the manner outlined above the finish will undoubtedly become sufficiently set to permit dusting with a soft cloth, such as cheese-cloth, etc.

Care of Tires

Winter is hard on tires. Ruts are like emery cloth, and wear away the rubber tread at the sides of the casings, pieces of ice present razor edges, chains if improperly adjusted cut into the tread, etc. Spring is the customary time to give the car the "once over" preparatory to the summer driving season. The owner will, therefore, do well to carefully inspect the tires and vulcanize tire rubber into the tread at points showing wear, cuts, etc. The only purpose served by the rubber tread is to protect the inner fabric. If the cuts are allowed to remain open it is only to be expected that the elements will have their swing, causing sandblisters, blowouts and expense. A stitch in time saves nine.

help a little. Mine was, at the very start, a most virulent type of bee fever. The beekeeper from whom my first colony was purchased charged me $5.00 for a little weak colony of black bees in an eight-frame hive. There was only about a pint of bees; and this was about the first of May. It is hard to say which was the bigger fool. I paid the five cheerfully; and would have paid ten with an equal degree of gladness.

No doubt if you look around a little you can find colonies which may be purchased for five dollars. One man near here sold twelve colonies last spring for $3.75 each. A prospective beekeeper in Indiana tells me he can buy bees in his locality at $5.00 per colony. Many of my own colonies were bought a few years ago at $2.00 each. Quite often a beekeeper will throw in extra supers and sections and odds and ends to get them out of the way. It is safe to say that $15.00 to $20.00 should give you a start.

Notice the illustration of the lady putting sections in an upper story. In this picture you will observe that there are as many styles of hives as there are hives. That's bad. Don't pay much for bees in such hives. If you are going to keep bees in an up-to-date way, you will have to discard the hives as fast as you have transferred the bees into their new quarters.

In imagination, we will open up one of these hives and look at the contents. The frames are very likely not of the Hoffman self-spacing kind; but what are called loose hanging; that is, they have to be spaced carefully by the beekeeper each time he handles the colony. These frames are probably glued together with an accumulation of burr-combs, making it difficult to examine the bees. If the frames are removed one by one, it will be found that some of them are more or less largely filled with drone comb. That means an army of drones instead of workers for the honey flow. There are thousands of colonies in such hives all over the country; so be careful in making your purchases and do not pay too much. If you can, get a beekeeper to go with you to help make the selection and to guard against getting bees affected with foul brood, a bee disease regarded as the beekeeper's most dreaded enemy.

Of course, having bought a colony of bees, it becomes necessary to choose the kind of hive in which you expect to place all of your bees as they increase; for nothing simplifies beekeeping more than uniformity of fixtures. Get the ten-frame dovetailed hive with 9 9-16 depth hive body. The metal covered, telescoping cover with an inner cover, which may be used as a bee-escape, is the best. This inner cover may be filled with newspapers in the fall; which helps to keep the bees warm. That saves honey. Also, it helps brood rearing in cool weather. It does not warp and twist and it excludes robbers. Be sure to specify that your hive bodies are to be 16¼ inches wide. The 16-inch width is too narrow. After brood frames are gummed up a little with propolis the 16¼ inch will be just right. The best super for comb honey production is the one fitted with 4¼x4¼x1⅞ inch two-beeway sections. For a time, a great many of us were in favor of the plain section with the fence separator; but some good beekeepers, after giving both a trial, prefer the two-beeway section mentioned above. The fence separator is very fragile. The little cleats are glued onto the separators; and so are the end pieces. The cleats should be nailed in place. The end pieces cannot be nailed in place and, in time, will come loose, cause the fence to collapse and make the beekeeper sputter. Having decided on the hive and super you want, stick to it. All of the supply manufacturers are making the dovetailed hive with Hoffman self-spacing frames, with endbars punctured for wiring, so you are not likely to go astray.

With bees bought, a sight must be chosen for the apiary. This should be a place sheltered from the cold, northerly winds. Anything that effectively breaks the force of the wind will do, such as forests, hedge rows, buildings. But it is not always possible to place bees where they will be sheltered from cold winds; and in that case the hives will have to be left exposed. But there is still a way to protect them. "How?" With bees. "What do you mean?" Keep colonies extra strong. It is astonishing how much cold a powerful colony of bees will endure. One of our yards is unavoidably exposed to the cold northwest winds, and yet in May, 1919, about six weeks after setting out from the cellar, a good many colonies were boiling over with bees and ready to swarm. Face colonies to the south. Some very good beekeepers face their hives to the east under the mistaken notion that the light, shining directly into the entrance, will entice the bees out to the fields earlier. It is not light; but it is light and warmth and a flow of honey which, combined, cause the bee to fly early. What careful observer among bees, has not noticed that, sometimes, regardless of light and warmth, bees do not go to the fields in large numbers until 10 A. M. It is evident that the nectaries are not secreting nectar in large quantities until that time.

The elderly gentleman holding a frame in his hands is having a good time amid his pleasant surroundings, isn't he? But he has made a mistake in placing his bees rather high and in omitting an alighting board to enable the bees to get to the entrance easily in a heavy honey flow and in cool weather. The bee-shed containing two colonies, shown in the illustration, is another sample of a mistake in the same line. A hive stand about six inches high with a slanting front and with the grass cut is the best. Have things that way if you can.

With new hives bought, it is necessary to get them ready for swarms. "Shall I put starters, that is, narrow strips of foundation in sections, and brood frames or shall I put in full sheets?" Put in full sheets. It costs more but it is cheaper. Notice the illustration of the brood

Improved Farming

By Modern Farm Machinery

THE latest patterns of implements and machines do away with much of the dreaded old-time drudgery of farm work. They also make farming possibly profitable where sufficient skilled help practically is non-available, and increase the profits from the employment of labor under all circumstances. Help is becoming so scarce, or actually is so scarce, that modern labor-saving implements must be employed or the farmer will have to sell out or rent to a man who has a big family of workers. They are necessary, too, to keep the boys on the farm and to make things as pleasant as possible for the hired "help" who will quickly go elsewhere if they do not find every convenience at hand. It may also be added that up-to-date tools are necessary, both for the better working of small areas of land and profitable farming on a large scale.

FARM TRACTOR TESTS.

How to Study Implements

The man who is isolated upon the farm, or has little or no opportunity of talking his business over with intelligent neighbors, often is ill-informed regarding the wonderful improvements that, of recent years, have been made in agricultural implements and machines. But he readily can find out about them and even become fairly expert in choosing the best or most suitable for his personal needs and particularly soil and locality by reading and studying the fine, interesting and instructive catalogues to be had from the leading manufacturers. The names of these firms may be learned by referring to the advertising columns of COMFORT, and other farm papers, and a letter to each firm, stating that the writer is a reader of the paper, will promptly bring the desired catalogue free of cost.

It is also well for the farmer, after consulting available catalogues, to visit the store and yard of the implement dealer in the nearest village or town, and learn what "makes" he handles. He may find to his surprise and satisfaction that he has in stock the very implement he has decided from his reading is the one he wants. If that is true, buying at home often proves most profitable, as freight charges are less than had a single purchase to be made from the firm headquarters or a dealer living at a distance. If the desired implement is not found in stock, the dealer will be glad to order it, and especially so if he can be convinced that it has special merit, or if several neighbors join in giving him a profitable order. Again, if there is no agent in the district who happens to handle a new machine or implement, a letter to the manufacturer, intimating that there would be a demand for the commodity, often will lead to the establishment of a local agency. We have even known, in some instances, of farmers of business capacity taking such agencies themselves and making them profitable. Then, too, the "live wire" farmer never should neglect to visit the county fairs, for at many of them the leading manufacturing firms have fine exhibits of modern implements and machines with expert salesmen in attendance to supply all needed information and demonstrate the working of their new models. From these men also can be obtained a wide variety of catalogues and "literature" for study at home, if the farmer has not quite made up his mind what would be best for him to buy.

Another source of information and instruction about farm implements that may be considered most reliable is the Farmers' Short Course offered during the winter months by agricultural experiment stations in many of the states. At these courses instructors in agricultural engineering assemble samples of the latest machines and give practical lessons in utilizing them to the best advantage. They are also ready and well qualified to answer questions and to solve problems often so puzzling to farmers who have not made a special study of the subject.

Finally, the state fair offers the best possible opportunity for the comparative study of a great assemblage of all sorts and makes of farm tools, implements and machines, and we always are pleased to note how earnest and interested thousands of farmers are in examining these varied exhibits.

The Implement-Poor Farmer

There are three types of farmers who correctly may be accounted implement poor.

WORKING MANURE SPREADERS IN WINTER.

The first of these is the man whose yards and buildings are littered with all kinds of old junk. He attends every deplenishing sale of farm stock and tools, and, hypnotized by the oily tongue of the auctioneer and jollied along by his bantering neighbors, buys things he doesn't need, cannot use, or that are not fit for use, and usually pays more than they are worth. A lot of the valuable time of this buyer of second-hand, scrapped and antiquated implements is spent or wasted in fixing and fitting them to sell over again or use when wanted. On this account he often gets behind in his work, and the old mower, harvester or other rickety machine probably breaks down just when it is most wanted. It would be well, indeed, for this type of farmer to sell all of his trash to the junk dealer at any price he can get for it, and buy a few good, modern, serviceable implements that will do his work efficiently and effectively.

The second implement-poor farmer is he who considers himself an expert mechanic and would rather be tinkering with bolts, nuts and bearings than doing the pressing work of his farm. He spends all he can scrape and even borrow in buying every new machine offered and proceeds to take it apart "to see how the wheels go round." Sometimes he can't properly put it together again, or it fails to work satisfactorily, and so is discarded. Such a man is foolish, extravagant, and rarely successful.

Lastly, there is the careless, shiftless man who buys good machines, well adapted for his work, uses them intelligently with good effect, and then leaves them to weather, depreciate, rust and rot just where he happens to unhitch his horses when the day's work and the job is finished. He has no implement shed. The new mower is pulled out and stored in the slough; the gaily painted harvester stands in an island of grass and weeds near the center of the stubble field or on a distant brushy headland. Nearby are the seeder, the disk, and the drag, and the orchard, the fence-sides and woodlot all show their complement of machines in all stages of dilapidation and "innocuous desuetude." This man is a lavish buyer and bad waster of implements. He is disliked by the manufacturer and dealer, who admire, on the contrary, the wise man who buys carefully, and as carefully considers what he buys.

The Wise Implement Owner

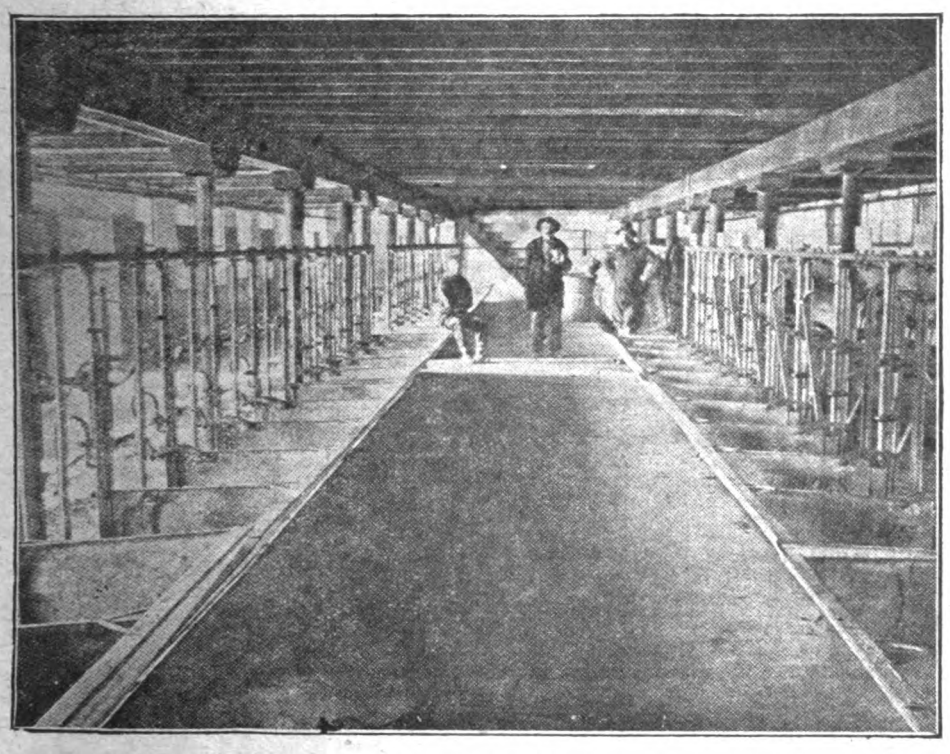
Wise, indeed, is the farmer who makes himself as thoroughly conversant with the various makes of machines and implements that he invests his money in those which are best adapted for his needs and of enduring quality. Such a man discards the old style machine when a newer one promises to do better and more profitable work, and then does his best at all times to keep the machine working perfectly without detrimental friction and wear of working parts. He also houses his property in such a way that it will not be damaged by exposure to the weather, and when the year's work is done stores each machine so that it will be ready for use when again required. He cleans, oils or greases all working parts and is not stingy in the matter of paint. Then you will see him making absolutely certain, long ahead of the time of need, that each machine is in good condition and fit for instant use.

The wise farmer buys the machines he actually needs and can use to advantage, chooses the types and makes best adapted for his type of soil and special crops, and then keeps depreciation down to a minimum. Every reader of COMFORT may well give those matters careful consideration and see to it that he is a member of the class of farmers here outlined as worthy of approbation.

Stable Conveniences

Space will not permit of a detailed description of the many modern improvements to be found inside of the well-ventilated, light, concrete-floored stables now coming into use wherever farm animale are being improved by the use of pure-bred sires. When we speak of "light" stables we not only mean that there are plenty of windows for the entrance of sunlight, but electric lights or some other artificial light that makes work in the dark hours a pleasure. Where there is an electric plant on the farm it now is possible also to milk the cows by that power, for a new milking machine has been perfected that one wheels behind each pair of cows in turn, connects with the electric supply wire, and proceeds to extract the milk. This compact little machine works on the pulsating suction system and seems to milk effectually. The older plan is to milk by means of a machine operated by compressed air and a gasolene engine. Several types of milking machines are now on the market, and if kept clean and operated strictly in accordance with directions given by the manufacturer, they do their work well, and do not cause garget or dry off the cows. It is best, however, to strip the cows clean by hand after the machine has extracted practically all of the milk.

Cow stables where milking machines are used also are equipped with individual drinking cups, steel feed barrows, and manure trolleys and carriers which greatly lessen hand labor. In connection, too, is the modern silo, and in a room overhead or nearby is an engine and various forms of cutters and grinders for the preparation of feed. In short, the modern stable and barn are coming to be equipped as well as any factory with the machinery necessary to maximum production at minimum expense, saving of man power, and prevention of waste.



Soil Tilling Implements

The preparation of a deep, fine, moist, mellow bed for the reception of seed is one of the most important operations of farming, and the man who is not equipped with effective implements is unable perfectly to do such work. He prepares a seed bed, but usually it is too shallow, or the soil is left too lumpy, so that the seed is covered imperfectly or buried while soil moisture is lost. When land was cheap and the demand for farm products less than it is today, these things did not matter so much, but now they are serious and to be obviated or remedied so far as possible. Not every man can own expensive implements, but those of old type or that have been worn out, for success, should be superseded by better ones.

Trucks and Manure Spreaders

Many prosperous farmers now use motor trucks, and are loud in their praise. Such men feed off large numbers of animals each year and so have much heavy hauling to do. The fact that they live where roads have been improved also makes it possible to use trucks successfully. On the contrary, we have heard of instances where heavy trucks have been ordered off dirt roads in Virginia. They naturally run best on hard-surface roads and do not injure them materially. They save time and labor in such districts. As one user has said: "The truck greatly decreases the distance in time between farm and town, an item which may mean a good many dollars saved when there are hogs to be hauled on a hot summer morning." Some farmers emphasize the saving effected when motor trucks are used to market the grain as it comes from the thresher in autumn. In some districts horses have been dispensed with in taking the grain from the separator. The sentiment seems to be in favor of one-ton motor trucks for ordinary farm use.

The manure spreader is one of the most popular implements on the modern farm, or it may be asserted that no farm is modern unless a manure spreader is used. It enables one man to haul and spread without assistance ten loads of manure or more, while five or six loads made up a good day's work when spreading was done by hand. The spreading also is very much better done than by hand. Experience teaches that it is better policy to spread the year's output of manure thinly upon a wide area of land than to spread it thickly on a small area. The spreader does the thin spreading evenly and quickly, and as many a farm makes from 100 to 200 loads of manure annually, the saving is immense when it can be quickly and evenly spread. The manure spreader can also be used to distribute lime and fertilizer by putting a layer of about an inch of wet straw on the apron to prevent the lime stone from sifting through. Another great advantage in favor of the manure spreader is that by daily use it keeps the stables clean and sanitary, which was not the case when manure was piled under the windows and in the stock yard.

Several forms of straw-spreaders also have been perfected and are in use on large farms where years ago the straw was burned shortly after threshing. Some farmers bale straw and sell it for use in the army or city stables, but that is poor policy. The best way of disposing of straw is to feed that which is palatable, bright oat straw especially, and use the remainder as bedding for animals, mulching purposes or spreading and plowing under. A special spreader makes it an easy matter to get the straw onto the fields, and it has been found profitable to utilize it in that way.

Plowing the Land

Readers of COMFORT no doubt have seen pictures of great tractors hauling numbers of plows on the wide, level prairie wheat fields of the Northwest and Far West, or immense machines that not only harvest the crop when ripe but thresh and sack the grain at one operation. They are also aware that without such machines wheat raising on a large scale would be impossible or unprofitable in remote districts where farm hands are scarce and wages correspondingly high. To them such implements are a mere matter of curiosity or astonishment, and they may not be aware that for small farms such as theirs comparatively inexpensive modifications of such tools now are available.

The small farm tractor recently has been introduced and is fast coming into use. In Europe such tractors also are doing much of the farm work and in many places they are operated by women.

These tractors at first were intended principally for plowing, but now they not only do that work but furnish the power for threshing, silo filling, wood sawing and grain grinding. More recently special tractors have been devised that can be used to cultivate corn about as readily as a team of horses. A tractor of this type, with a cultivating or harvesting implement attached, forms one unit and is operated by one man. He sits on the implement at the center of all controls of both tractor and implement and can see the work he is doing. Formerly the implements were hauled by the tractor and often required a man or two to work them properly, in addition to the expert mechanic. The tractor now works ahead like a team of horses, but does not require the use of horses to complete its work. The entire outfit turns short, backs readily, and makes fence corners produce.

It may be said, however, that tractors thus far have, as a rule, only been bought and used by men who own comparatively large farms that are level and easy to work with such machines. It would seem advisable, too, that the man who is to invest in a tractor should have some ability as a mechanic so that he will be able to keep the machine in order and insure it a fairly long life of utility. It is most important in making such a purchase that the tractor chosen should have proved practical and profitable in the field, and it is therefore a good plan to select one that has been used to advantage in the district in which the purchaser lives, or that has been tried out and found practical by the agricultural engineers of the state agricultural experiment station.

Requirements for Agricultural Tractors

The official report of the judges on extensive tractor trials held in England last September ends with some very practical suggestions which may be summarized as follows:

CONSTRUCTION.—It is deemed a great necessity that simplicity of construction should be very carefully considered in an agricultural tractor as such a machine has to be worked by men who have little mechanical knowledge and often at long distances from any place of repair. Strength is very important both in build and engine power, and it is best to have a considerable reserve of both, as through a sudden and great variation of land a heavy strain is often quickly imparted to the machine. The engine and as many of the working parts as possible should be well enclosed, as at work both dust and dirt have to be guarded against.

TRACTOR WHEELS IN FURROW.—While not convinced that it is in every case desirable to have one of the tractor wheels running in the furrow, the judges observed that when this is the case the tractor is more or less self-steering and allows the operator to devote more attention to the plow. The furrow wheels, however, should be of such a width as not to necessitate the making of too wide a furrow.

CATERPILLAR TRACKS.—The use of caterpillar tracks undoubtedly reduces the pressure per square inch on the land, and where well designed may permit of plowing under conditions where a wheeled tractor could not be used. There is, however, room for further investigation as to the wearing capacity of these tracks and as to whether an efficient system of protection of the wearing parts and their proper lubrication can be devised.

SPEED.—The judges gave it as their opinion that a tractor, to be satisfactory for all kinds of farm work, should have three speeds, varying from two to five miles an hour.

POSITION OF EXHAUST.—The exhaust should be so placed that it will not be a nuisance to the operator or have a deleterious effect upon the machinery attached to the tractor.

DRAW-BARS, ETC.—The desirability of spring attachments between the tractor and plough or other implements, combined with a release device in case of severe shocks, was emphasized. The draw-bar connections are still capable of improvement and these should admit of alterations both horizontally and vertically. The judges believe that these fitments should be an integral part of the tractor.

LIGHT-WEIGHT TRACTORS.—They were pleased to observe that a large number of the tractors which did good work were of comparatively light weight, and that the tendency of the makers is more and more in that direction.

Horse Drawn Plows and Disks

Walking and gang plows to be pulled by horses also have been greatly improved of recent years. More important, perhaps, has been the improvement in the manner in which horses are used to operate plows, disks and drags. Better multiple hitches for eight, six and four-horse teams have been devised and have been illustrated in the farm papers and demonstrated in the field. They have proved the great flexibility in power in horses for farm work. Thus one eight-horse team on a double disk with a harrow behind may later be broken into two four-horse teams for seeding, or into one pair for planting and a four for harrowing and an extra pair for general work, or a little later into four separate teams for cultivating. "No other source of power in actual use on the farm," says Wayne Dinsmore, secretary of the Percheron Society of America, "has this flexibility, and the same applies to hauling; for, when six-horse teams are needed on heavy loads, they can be used readily, but can be broken into three teams and put on three separate jobs when necessity requires." He refers in these remarks to heavy draft horses of fine quality which are the only animals that can do farm work efficiently in competition with the tractor.

Pulverizing Implements

To obtain "fine tilth," as it is called, or, in other words, finely pulverized soil, many different implements now are used according to the character of the soil. Heavy clay requires most careful and judicious handling. If it is plowed or disked when wet it may prove absolutely impossible to form a fine, porous seed bed, but plowed and disked at the right time, various kinds of harrows or drags soon get it into good condition. Spring-tooth and heavy drags do the heavy work and wood-frame lever harrows follow. An all-steel harrow cart is a new improvement. Walking after the harrows always was a most tiring job, for to do good work the horses must be made to travel fast. Now the operator attaches the cart to any style of drag harrow, and it saves him many days' hard tramp. Such a cart with 24-inch wheels weighs 95 pounds.

Steel zigzag harrows are new and popular, especially for light soil in the wheat country of the Northwest. There are three sections and each has twenty teeth, and cuts three feet wide. Heavy oak frame harrows still are very popular. Sections are independently connected to the draw-bar with drop link clevises allowing flexibility. The 150-tooth harrow cuts 26 feet, has one center, two wide and two narrow side sections, and a four-horse draw-bar which is fitted with a sheave-pulley and roller chain draft-equalizer. It can be used as a 78-tooth or as a 102-tooth harrow by separating the sections and using a shorter draw-bar. Disk harrows, which are becoming more and more popular, now are made with or without tongues. A new type has cut-out disks, and one can also buy a reversible disk harrow and cultivator for corn and another type for use in orchards. The latter may be had with extensions and tree guards.

Corn Crop Tools

What wonderful improvements have been made, in recent years, in all implements used for seeding, working and harvesting the corn crop. Two- and four-wheel sulky listers are now much in use and a combined lister and drill is available. One can also buy a serviceable one-horse power wheel corn drill, or a handy force feed cotton and corn planter. Then come the big flat and forced drop double-row corn planters, with check rower attachments now universally used in the big corn-fields of the Middle West, and one can buy a two-cylinder rotary seed corn grader so that the seed may be properly prepared to work well in the planter. A big two-row cotton and corn planter also is on the market, and we are glad to note the introduction of a powerful cotton and corn-stalk cutting machine for cleaning up a field for a small grain crop. Then, of course, there are several fine makes of corn cutting and binding harvesters and simpler ones that cut but do not bind, so that one need not do so much back-bending in cutting corn for silo filling.

Corn cultivators nowadays are a positive pleasure to operate, compared with the old-fashioned, crude walking cultivators we had to use thirty or forty years ago. The draft has been greatly lessened and the machine also is easier on the workman, while all manner of attachments have been devised, from shovels and disks to fine weed cutting teeth and knives. One can now work the crop level and form an effective dust mulch to conserve moisture, which is of great importance, or "plow" deeply, or throw the dirt up to the plants at will. The old tools should be at once discarded in favor of these newer, better, time-saving and yield-increasing cultivators.

Silo Filling Machines

Filling the silo is a big job at best, and one that many farmers dread, but the manufacturers certainly have done their part in simplifying and lessening the labor necessary to harvest and store the silage corn crop for winter use. They have supplied low-wheeled truck wagons for hauling and all sorts of fine cutters and carriers and blowers, with devices also for wetting down too dry corn as it enters the blower. Gasolene and kerosene burning engines for the work also have been greatly improved, nor is the price so high that the prosperous farmer cannot afford such a machine to do his wood sawing, grain grinding, pumping, and even threshing, as well as silo filling. Where one farmer cannot afford to own a large outfit for such work, a number of farmers in one neighborhood can join in the purchase, and such "team work" rapidly is coming into vogue, and giving good satisfaction in many farm districts.

Machine Handling the Potato Crop

It used to be one of the irksome jobs of each spring season to cut the potato "sets," but this work has been simplified by the use of improved cutting knives or a cutting box. Many growers, however, prefer to plant whole tubers and separate them with graders which screen out the smaller potatoes and hold in the large, fine ones for selling. The potatoes then are put in the ground by means of a modern planter which picks the tubers up with flexible fingers on an endless chain and sets them at correct depth and distance apart in the well-prepared soil. Then there are several different styles of row sprayers for the treatment of the growing vines to kill potato bugs and prevent early and late leaf blight. Some spray a number of rows at one time, but knapsack sprayers are provided for the small grower or gardener. Fine tools also have been devised for keeping the crop free from weeds and forming a surface mulch, and when the crop is ripe diggers are available which quickly raise the tubers and shake them free from earth and vines. The greatest improvements have of recent years been made in the horse-drawn digger, and it now is about perfect for work in mellow potato land and no longer mutilates the tubers.

Haying by Machinery

Hay has become so scarce and dear that labor-saving devices more than ever have become imperative in the hay fields. Mowers have been increased in width of cutting bar, and decreased in draft and now do their work splendidly, and some of them even have been made readily adjustable for side-hill use. On one that we have noticed is a side-bunching or collecting device which makes it easier to follow with a self-loader. Where such a device is not used the side-delivery rake quickly puts the hay into rows for the loader. If the hay is not quite dry enough for loading or has been wetted by rain, efficient tedders may be used to shake it up, and then there are several forms of "sweeps," by means of which hay in large quantities may be carried to the stack without loading it on wagons. Such sweeps deliver onto other long-toothed holders which hoist the hay onto the stack, or should such stackers not be used, the new pattern forks or slings will raise a load onto the stack in two to four "bites."

Great improvements also have been made in other implements for handling hay. One of them is a sliding top for the hayrack to use with the hay loader, a revolving hayrack for the same purpose, a drum hoist for pulling the hay rope for stacking or mowing into the barn, a tilting-platform mower for sliding the hay to either side of the mow as desired, and a ball-bearing swivel for fastening the end of the hay rope to the hay track carrier. This device prevents the hay rope from twisting when pulling up the hay, and is considered a great improvement. Another fine machine is the self-threading hay press, in which the wires for tying the bales are threaded through the press at the proper time by two arms and held until tied. This obviates the necessity of using blocks to separate the bales and of threading the wires by hand.

"There was poetic justice in the wholesale discharges at the gun factory."

"How so?"

"The entire outfit was fired."

AFTER such an overgrown winter as we have had, these April days, with the smell of spring in the air, make me so happy that I could dance a jig on the housetops. Not that I ever have or really ever expect to, but I've heard of it being done and it is a belief of mine that whatever has been done before can be done again. That's a good point to remember, girls, instead of giving up a more worthy task as impossible. However, I won't horrify my neighbors by such an unladylike action but will devote my surplus energy to answering the heap of letters before me. The first is from PERPLEXED, Indiana, who thinks I have a "girl or two of my own." No, dear, I haven't, but that doesn't prevent me from understanding and loving other girls. I try to be a mother to all girls since it isn't my good fortune to have children of my own—and a home and a Ford and a husband and a cat and a dog and a canary. Give your girl friend and the young man a chance to explain before judging either. I'm inclined to think he is telling the truth but have it out with both of them, at the same time if necessary. If she has lied to you she isn't worthy of your friendship and love, so don't let it hurt you too much. (2) There were one or two grammatical errors in your letter but on the whole it was above the average I receive.

M. E. D., Pennsylvania.—My, but she's greedy! A regular pig! In love with her uncle and also a young man of twenty who has a very rich father. She wants uncle's farm, but if she marries him she can't marry this only child of a very rich father. I know something better than marrying either your uncle or the young man—marry his father!

MAY, Indiana.—Don't talk to people; find out what they are interested in and let them talk to you. It's as much of an art to be a good listener as it is to be a good talker. (2) Books, silver pencils, or fountain pens, are gifts welcomed by the average man. (3) You aren't too tall.

BROWN EYES, N. Mex.—It doesn't do a bit of harm for a girl of sixteen to think of eloping with a "handsome young man" of seventeen, if she confines herself to merely thinking about it and doesn't do it. That's my advice and if you follow it you'll thank me some day.

UNDECIDED, Mo.—Whether or not you marry the man who lowes you is for you to decide. If his ill health is permanent and he has only a pension of thirty dollars a month for the support of himself and wife—and family, doubtless—his love is very selfish. On the other hand, if you love him enough to share poverty with him and work with him, and for him if necessary, marry him and I'll admire you for it. But think it over first. (2) It isn't your "duty" to kiss him unless you want to, and if you feel that way about it you had better not marry him.

TED, West Virginia.—Greater love hath no man than he who giveth his marine blouse to another. Maybe it was too small for him, anyway, so don't judge his love by that alone. You might encourage him a little and find out how much he loves you; but for your own happiness and peace of mind don't love him very much unless you feel sure he loves you more.

VIRGINIA BRUNETTE, Virginia.—Better wait until he gets his divorce before you correspond with him. Wife or wife's lawyer might get hold of some of your letters and divorce suits are ugly things to be mixed up with—particularly as co-respondent.

PAL, California.—Bless you, my dear, you are a girl after my own heart and I'm sure we could be good pals, as I like to do all the things you do,—swimming and riding, but I haven't tried to stand on my head for some years. Of course I understand that you don't really do it, but merely that you prefer to wear clothes that allow you plenty of freedom, such as bloomers and gym shoes, so that you could if you wanted to. But you should know how to do housework even if you don't like it. I'd want my daughter, if I had one, to know how to cook and sew and do housework, as well as to shoot and ride and swim. Is there a Girl Scout organization near you?

JULIA, Texas.—Never mind, dear, if everybody says you are good looking. Maybe they aren't telling the truth and if they are there's lots worse things than being good looking—being conceited, for instance. Is it any harm to "set on a boy's lap if the car is so ful there ain't no room for you to set enywhere elce and enyway I love the boy's lap I was settin on." It may be that your love for his lap glorifies the action and makes it right. I don't know positively for I never loved anyone's lap. Poor fat men! They haven't much lap to be loved. (2) Boys don't waste a lot of time kissing their sisters so don't let them fool you with this sister-kiss stuff. It's old.

WHOSE GIRLS? Virginia.—Not mine, certainly. Am sorry to say it, but I don't think girls of fifteen and sixteen should go to a dance with two young men and without a chaperon, no matter how much they might want to. We always want to do the things we shouldn't. (2) Doubtless you "dare" to kiss them good night but it is better not to. Save your courage for a more worthy deed. Now you know I'm not "a lovable lady with auburn hair and a dimple," as you were kind enough to picture me. (3) Brown should be a becoming color for both.

ANXIOUS FOR HELP, Va.—Unfortunately I haven't any artists or teachers of drawing concealed in my desk or up my sleeve, as you seem to think. Send me a sample of your work and if it is worth while I'll advise you further.

LOUISE, Mo.—There's nothing you can do but keep silent. I shouldn't think you'd care about speaking to such a rude person anyway.

EDNA, Minn.—If your mother doesn't object it doesn't seem that there could be any harm in friendly letters, but be very careful what you write. What does your mother say about the Christmas gifts? You are an ambitious girl and I wish you success with your school work.

BLUE EYES, Mo.—When Mr. Right comes along, if he is Mr. Right, he will appreciate you all the more for your convictions. By "large" do you mean that you are fat? Reduce if you are, for fat and romance aren't good mixers.

GLADYS, N. C.—Love at first sight has been known to happen and it may be so in your case. Absence is a good love tester. How do you feel toward him now? (2) When in doubt—don't kiss.

BLONDY, Virginia.—Your spelling and writing would indicate more intelligence than your questions. If my fiance denied that he was engaged to me—well, he wouldn't be, that's all, particularly when it happened to be to a girl he was going out with.

Now I'm going to look for the Mayflowers which the April showers bring. Want to come with me?

By, by. COUSIN MARION.

Good Equipment a Strong Factor in Success

PEOPLE who have only a few hens and have plenty of time can get along without equipment, because they can fuss with food and water and such things at all hours of the day. A man or woman who starts poultry raising with the idea of developing a business may be compelled for want of capital to do without necessary fixings, but just as soon as there are any profits coming in, up-to-date, labor-saving devices should be acquired, because they save time; and time is money when you are running a business enterprise. Besides which, they usually mean greater comfort for the stock, and that increases production, and most certainly they lend an air of prosperity and business enterprise to the establishment, which impresses visitors. But the real advantage lies in the saving of time, an advantage to stock. Take self-feeders, for instance. They need only to be filled once or twice a week, according to the number of hens you keep, and the sized hopper you buy. Fill them with dry mash, and the hens can take a little whenever they want it, just as they would if they were out on free range; an economy in feeding, for when they take it little and often through the day, they eat reasonably what they really need at the regular feed hours, instead of gobbling up all their crops will hold, which is more than they can assimilate or use, either for bodily heat or production of eggs, so a great part of the food which has cost money simply overtaxes the birds' digestive organs and upsets their health, without in any way benefiting the poor man who has spent his money for feed.

The automatic hopper for small grain is another time saver, and most valuable to the man or woman who is occupied during the middle of the day, and can only feed at night and morning. The automatic is worked by the hens themselves. The smell of the grain attracts them, and they jump on the base, which releases a spring, and scatters grain on the litter, so that the hens have to scratch for it, which insures their getting plenty of exercise. Drinking fountains are really a sanitary necessity, and should be one of the first things bought. Trap nests, incubators and brooders have all been discussed rather fully in the early spring numbers, so I shan't give them any space this month.

Of course, a well constructed house, with practical accessories, means quick and easy work, and well-made brood coops are just as necessary. Have you ever kept track of the time spent in opening and closing makeshift brood coops, where pieces of board have got to be put up in front of openings, or some such contrivance? Then there is always the fear that the work has been done in a hurry, and the stone or stick may slip down, and leave an opening for the chicks to slip through in the early morning before the grass is dry, and when stray cats or hawks are prowling about, ready to pounce down and destroy the poor little creatures.

The henhouses are the foundation of an up-to-date plant, but I have enumerated some of the small things first, because singly they don't cost very much, and can be bought from week to week, as money comes in. A new house requires quite a sizable amount of cash. However, it should be built as soon as you can possibly manage it, for good housing increases egg production, materially lessens the fear of disease and hastens ultimate success for a flock of birds numbering twenty-five or forty. The open front insures circulation of fresh air and ventilation, so the house is especially valuable for sections of the country where they have cold winters, as the constant circulation of air night and day prevents the birds getting overheated during the night and chilled in the early morning, which they are very apt to do when closed houses are used. I will try to explain the construction and inside fixtures so clearly that any handy man can build it without the help of a carpenter.

The house should be located on dry, well-drained land, and should face south or a little east of south. Twelve posts are needed, five for each side and one for the center of each end. Post holes should be made three feet, and posts should be well tamped to make them firm. Sills of four by four-inch stock are laid level on top of posts and spiked to them. Ends are halved to match sill joints.

Nest is placed with entrance at drop board level (two feet above top of sill). Food hopper and water pail are at convenient height for fowls. We prefer to place them high and to make a slatted platform in front of each for fowls to fly up to. This keeps food and water up out of litter and dirt. It also leaves more free floor space, as floor beneath platform is open and available. If rear section is made two feet deeper, making whole house sixteen feet deep, it will give room for one more roost and give a capacity of forty layers for winter or thirty for summer; fowls confined to house or with only a small yard. Nests are simple boxes twelve by twenty-four inches, inside measure, open at north end only and have shed-roof hinged cover. With more than twenty-five fowls a second nest should be supplied.

Building Instructions

Door placed in east wall between two highest studs, with bottom just below top of sill to break joint and stop draft. Door opens outward and hinges on north side. A screen door of one-inch mesh netting should be made to open in, just inside of solid door. This is useful in summer time or at any time when it is desired to have door open. A litter board from floor level to four to six inches above sill is used to keep all litter in rear section of house. It should be made removable, resting in cleats. Front section should have sand or earth floor only. In rear section use clean oat straw litter or dry leaves. This house may be made with sand or gravel floor only filled in to top of sill, but we use light wooden floors and raise the house on blocks. Sand and litter should be renewed as often as needed.

After sills are laid studs should be placed in position and nailed to sills. Plates are spiked to top of studs after making sure to have them plumb. Rafters are lightly notched to engage plate. Side boards should be put on in horizontal position and should be covered with good roofing fabric. Roof boards lay east and west. Joints of sides with roof should be flush and smooth. Roofing fabric for sides should go up and down and should lap on roof about one foot. This gives a windproof joint. Eaves at north end of house should be made by a double course to project three inches. Roof covering should be laid to roll east and west with generous laps, and should allow only four inches of shingle course to make eaves in same manner as north end.

Windows for semi-monitor top should be three three-light common small cellar windows, and should be screwed tightly in position to make a wind and storm proof joint. These windows may be removed in hot summer weather, but in cold climates should be firmly fixed in place from September 1st until first settled warm weather in June. West window may also be removed in hot summer weather and replaced by wire screen. With windows out in warm weather, the house is cool and comfortable even in "dog days."

Front Elevation

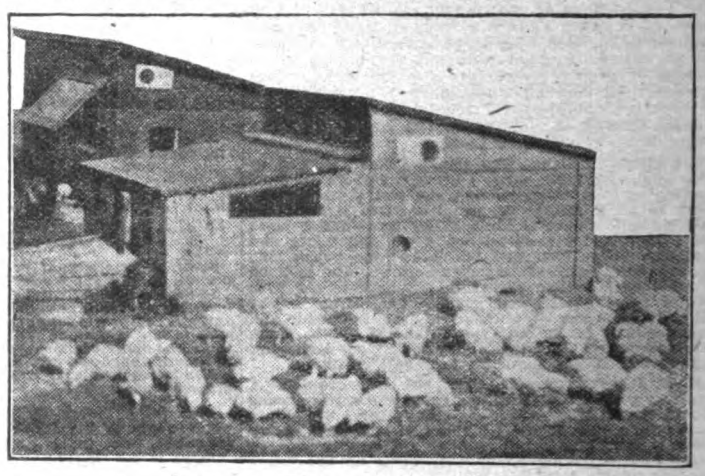
The front is boarded up from bottom eighteen inches to break floor drafts and is also boarded down six inches from top. Balance is one quarter inch wire netting. Door for fowls is only break in wire front, and is closed by a board shutter run in cleats on the inside.

Nest boxes, which contain two nests each, are placed at each end of the house. The dropping board is eighteen inches above the floor, three feet wide, and runs the full length of the back wall. The roosting frame, consisting of one or three perches, according to the number of birds which are to occupy the roosting house, is elevated on nine-inch legs above the dropping board. Three self-feeding hoppers stand on a shelf fixed on the wall of the east end of the house, and eighteen inches above the floor. A perch is fixed in front of them, so the birds can hop upon it while helping themselves to dry mash, grit or oyster shell. A water fountain stands on a smaller shelf on the west end wall, and, of course, a perch in front of it. Lifting the feed and water on shelves leaves all the floor space free, and prevents feed or litter being scratched into them. Whatever else you may omit in the way of inside fixtures, don't forget to put in a board to keep back all litter, otherwise it will be scratched up under the windows and get wet every time there is a driving rain or snowstorm. And then, ten to one, it will become moldy, and within a month or so birds will commence to show signs of sickness, for moldy bedding causes trouble with breathing and digestive organs, and is often the unsuspected cause of serious epidemics.

Lice Exterminator

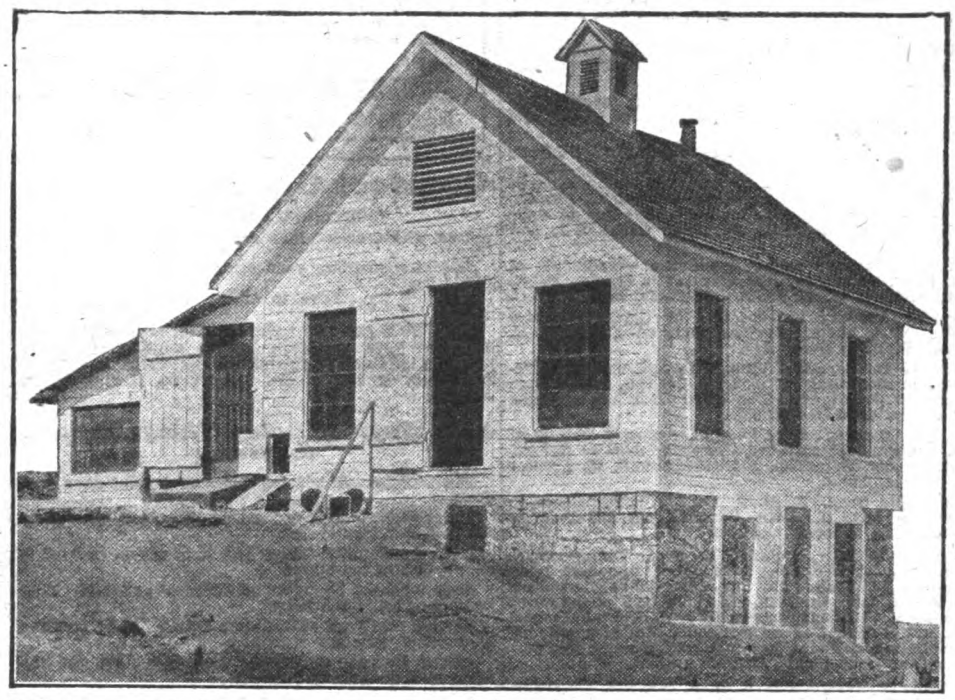
One of the most difficult problems which the poultry keeper has to meet is that of keeping his poultry houses and stock reasonably free from lice, mites and other external parasites.

In keeping a poultry plant free from lice there are two points of attack; one, the birds themselves; the other, the houses, nest boxes, roosting boards, etc.



In using any kind of lice powder on the birds themselves, it should always be remembered that a single application of powder is not sufficient. When there are lice present on a bird, there are always unhatched eggs of lice (nits) present, too. The proper procedure is to follow up a first application of powder with a second at an interval of four days to a week. If the birds are badly infested at the beginning it may be necessary to make still a third application. To clean the cracks and crevices of the woodwork of houses and nests of lice and vermin, a liquid spray or paint is probably the most desirable form of application.

A splendid lice powder may be made at a cost of only a few cents a pound in the following way: Take three parts of gasolene and one part of crude carbolic acid; mix these together, and add gradually with stirring, enough plaster of Paris to take up all the moisture. The liquid and the dry plaster should be thoroughly mixed and stirred so that the liquid will be uniformly distributed throughout the plaster. When enough plaster has been added, the resulting mixture will be a dry, pinkish brown powder having a fairly strong carbolic odor and a rather less pronounced gasolene odor.



Do not use more plaster in mixing than is necessary to blot up the liquid. This powder is to be worked into the feathers of the birds affected with vermin. The bulk of the application should be in the feathers around the vent and on the ventral side of the body and in the fluff under the wings. Its efficiency, which is greater than that of any other lice powder known to the writer, can be very easily demonstrated by anyone to his own satisfaction. Take a bird that is covered with lice and apply the powder in the manner just described. After the lapse of about a minute, shake the bird, loosening its feathers with the fingers at the same time, over a clean piece of paper. Dead and dying lice will drop on the paper in great numbers. Anyone who will try this experiment will have no further doubt of the wonderful efficiency and value of this powder.

For a spray or paint to be applied to roosting boards, nest boxes, or walls and floor of the henhouses, the following preparation is used: Three parts of kerosene and one part crude carbolic acid. This is stirred up when used, and may be applied with any of the hand spray pumps or with a brush.

In both these formulas it is highly important that crude carbolic acid be used instead of the purified product. Be sure and insist on the druggist giving you crude carbolic acid. It is a dark brown, dirty looking fluid, and its value depends on the fact that it contains tar oil and tar bases in addition to the pure phenol (carbolic acid).

LITTLE CHICKS AND OUTDOOR BROODERS.

A Model Poultry House. The basement is used as an incubator cellar. Right-hand side of this room is fitted with a seven-compartment brooder where chicks stay until four weeks old, when they are moved to the lean-to brooder-house which has outdoor yards. Left-hand side of this room is used as feed room and at one end is a bench for killing and dressing the broilers which are marketed when from ten to twelve weeks old.

M. M. W.—It would not be advisable to use permanganate of potassium in drinking water for little turkeys, because if you put enough in to kill any germs it would be too strong for the intestines of young birds. Better give them sour milk to drink. It is much safer. Yes; you can wipe the eggs with wood alcohol; it will answer as well as pure alcohol.

F. S.—The January and February numbers of COMFORT will help you on incubation and brooding. As you only intend to raise about 150 chicks, I don't think it would be advisable to buy a coal burner brooder. Better get a lamp heated outdoor brooder—a box brooder—or if you have a warm room in which to keep two or three home-made fireless brooders, they would answer very well for such a small number. See answer to M. J. F. in this number. Early in the spring, when the nights are still cold, chicks should be allowed access to a brooder at night, until eight weeks of age. In warm weather brooders may be dispensed with when the chicks are five or six weeks old.

F. E. S.—You don't give me any idea of the approximate age of the fowls, or how much you feed them, so it is quite difficult for me to tell whether they are suffering from rheumatism or the effect of liver trouble, as lameness is a symptom of both diseases. Is the house dry and well ventilated? Plenty of fresh cold air never hurts hens. Drafts and dampness are fatal. If a number of hens are kept in a tight, warm house, the moisture from the birds' breaths will collect on the walls and ceiling, and cause the house to become damp in cold weather. In such a case, the birds will be very likely to be suffering from rheumatism. Examine a few hens; if they feel fat and baggy, you may be pretty sure that you are feeding too heavily, and that the lameness is caused by liver complaint. For rheumatism, correct the troubles of the house. If the floor is damp, fill it in. If the house is small and has no ventilation, take out one or two of the windows and cover the openings with unbleached muslin. Rub the birds' shanks and feet with a mixture of two tablespoonfuls of sweet oil to one tablespoonful of spirits of turpentine. For liver

It is really a fine height, as you fill out more. What you should do is to seek to gain in weight and fill out your figure. There isn't any way to "stop growing," my dear, but you probably will not add much more, if any, to your stature. Tall women need to be careful how they stand. Sometimes they are inclined to stoop over a little. That is a bad thing, for they need to stand well. To be straight does not make one a bit taller, indeed it adds grace to the inches we have. So cultivate a good backbone, my dear, and hold yourself well. Don't even let your chin sag but give it an independent poke into the air which sort of seems to say that you are exactly the right height and know it. About the scars, if they are recent they will no doubt soon pass away. It is against the rules of this department to give the names of any advertised articles, but any cream which you see constantly advertised in all the big magazines is pretty sure to be reliable. The only object of using a skin food in massaging a scar is to soften the skin as you manipulate it. It is the massaging which does the real work. You might try dampening the scars with a cloth dipped in peroxide of hydrogen, but do not use this more than once a day for a few days.

"CICERO."—Did you ask your druggist for toilet ammonia? You probably have the undiluted ammonia, though if you have added as much water as ammonia that ought not to be too strong. Your skin may be more than ordinarily sensitive. Unless it irritates your skin unduly, I should continue to use it.

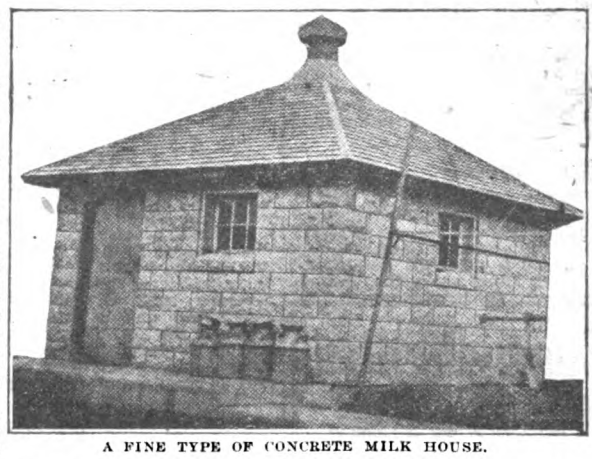
FARM HOUSE EQUIPPED WITH ALL MODERN IMPROVEMENTS.

Farm Improvements that Are Good Investments

"Let There Be Light"

AS the command, "Let there be light," found in the first chapter of Genesis, was the first necessity for human happiness upon this earth—so even today it still stands.



No home can fully enjoy the delights of a good book by the winter fireside without adequate light. Our grandfathers read by the glow of the huge logs upon the fire-dogs, our fathers by the kerosene lamp—but for us there is better light. This better light is adequately supplied by the city lighting plants for those who live in cities. But many farm homes are still in partial darkness. For them, too, "Let there be light."

Two Kinds of Lighting Plants

There are two classes of lighting plants for rural homes—gas and electricity. Small gas plants are made which are suitable for single homes. In these the gas is manufactured outside the house and led into the house in iron pipes. Similarly there are now on the market various types of small generators built especially for making the current necessary to lighting a country home. This current is distributed over the place by means of wires.

How Gas Plants Work

There are two principal kinds of gas plants used for making gas for the country home. The one uses acetelene, the other gasolene gas. Both of these plants are much like each other in general plan of distribution and use of gas.

A FINE TYPE OF CONCRETE MILK HOUSE.

The gasolene tank is almost always placed outside the house—preferably buried in the ground; the acetelene seldom is for obvious reasons. The gasolene is pumped inside the building and here mixed with air, forming a combustible gas which is stored in a little tank exactly like the huge tanks used by city gas companies. From this tank it is piped to the lights and to the stoves where it is burned.

Acetelene gas is made in an enclosed tank so arranged that a small stream of water drops upon a substance called "carbide." The gas thus provided is stored away for use in a tank very similar to the one used for the storage of gasolene gas. The tanks are of such size that if properly attended to there is always sufficient gas supply on hand for daily use.

How This Gas Gives Light

Both kinds of gas are used in the same way for the same purposes—heat and light. The only difference is in the burner used. Acetelene gas burning in the air gives a bright, white light, hence open burners that need no mantle are usually used. For general use these burners should be protected by shades.

Gasolene on the other hand gives little light on burning in air. This necessitates the use of a "mantle." This mantle is composed of a substance called calcium, which, when hot, shines with a bright white light. In the gasolene lamp, therefore, the light is produced by the glow of the white hot calcium while in the acetelene the light is caused by the burning itself.

Gas for Cooking

In every home equipped with a gas lighting plant the same gas should also be used for cooking. Special gas stoves with burners adapted for each kind of gas are on the market. It is so easy and clean and economical to cook with gas. No housewife who has ever tried to cook with gas will go back to the old-fashioned method.

Electric Light for the Farm and Home

Every farmer knows the inconvenience of doing chores around the barn all winter by lantern light. Yet this is done on almost every farm throughout the country. It need not be so. Either gas or electricity may be used to light the barn—the latter preferred, because of its greater safety, though modern gas lights may be protected by glass globes that reduce the fire risk to a minimum. So far as electricity is concerned, the ordinary farm lighting plant is absolutely safe.

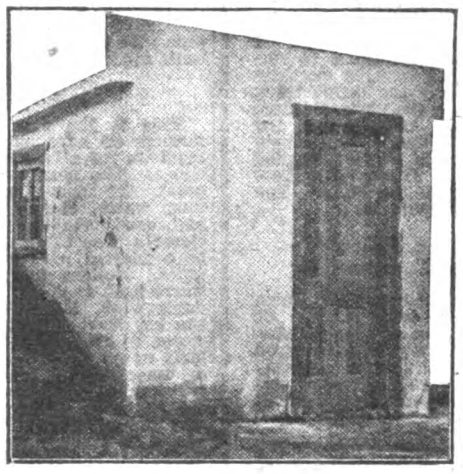
How Electricity Is Generated

There are three different ways of generating the electric current for farm use—by wind—by water and by engine power. When connections may be had with a city lighting plant, of course the city current should be used but the farmer no longer needs to depend on city plants. He can have an electric plant all his own at no great cost.

The Windmill and Electricity

The cheapest source of electric current is the ordinary windmill when properly connected to a suitable generator. During the past few years the dynamo has been greatly improved for use in the automobile and a similar generator slightly larger will serve for use in connection with the windmill. From the generator the current is led on heavy copper wire to the storage battery, usually of 15 or 16 cells, which gives a low voltage of 30 bolts. Such low voltage can do no harm—one scarcely feels it if taken through the hand—and it cannot easily cause a fire on short circuit. When the wind blows, the current is stored in the battery to be drawn upon as needed.

The Gas Engine for Driving the Generator



On nearly every farm there is a gas engine of some sort which may be "hooked-up" with the same kind of a generator and the electric current stored up in the batteries to be used in exactly the same way.

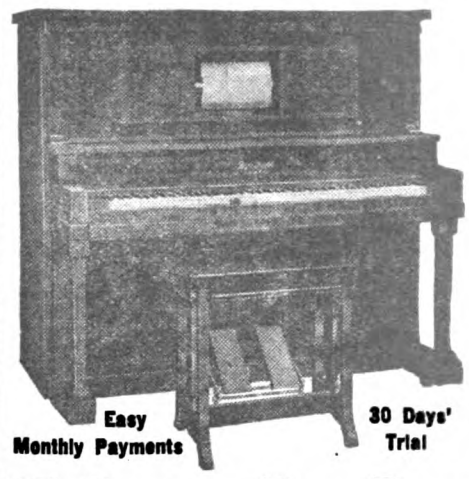
Often the engine is used in pumping or at some other work when the load is light. Where this is true, the dynamo may be run at very little extra cost. Some farmers even use their automobile generators to light their country homes. The method is simple. Two wires are run from the main posts of a 16-cell battery which they have stored in the garage alongside of the auto. These loose ends are quickly attached to the two terminals of the automobile generator and the engine allowed to run at the proper speed. This is one of the easiest ways, but not the easiest, to provide electric lights for the farm home. Here is still an easier way if only one or two lights are used.

Just run a double wire into the house and suspend from its terminals an electric bulb of the same size used in the auto headlight. Attach the other two free ends to the terminals of the auto storage battery and the job is done. When the switch at the bulb is turned, the current is drawn from the auto storage battery. If it runs low, start the engine.

The Combined Engine Generator

So popular has the demand for electricity on the farm become that many concerns are now making a combined engine and generator in one machine. The power is furnished by gasolene and the gas engine and the dynamo are hooked up together on the same shaft; aside from this arrangement, the connections are the same as those already described. For all electric light plants a 15 or 16-cell storage battery is essential, that is one giving an electrical pressure of at least 30 volts.

SOLID CONCRETE MILK HOUSE.



Electricity—From Water Power

There is on many farms, if properly utilized, sufficient water power to run a generator that will provide all the light needed on the place. It only takes the tiniest of streams to do this, provided there is sufficient fall. Any stream that has flow and fall enough to develop one half horsepower—that is about enough power to turn a grindstone—will do the trick. Of course, the stream must be dammed and a suitable water wheel installed. The water wheel is connected directly to the generator and so geared as to produce the proper speed. The generator is connected to the storage battery and the current distributed in exactly the same way as in all the other systems described. The only thing to be reckoned with here is the distance from the water wheel or source of power to the farm buildings since relatively weak currents cannot be carried long distances owing to the resistance of the wire. Currents developed by one or two horse-power could not well be utilized more than a couple hundred of feet away.

The Necessary Parts of the Electric Plant

There are four essential parts to any farm electric light plant—the power, the generator, the storage battery and the distributing system. As has already been shown, the power may be furnished by a water-wheel, a windmill or an engine either gas or steam. The generator must always be purchased from an electrical supply house which makes a specialty of building these small dynamos. It must be adapted to the kind of storage battery used and the number of lights in the circuit.

Farm Improvements

The storage battery must also be adapted to the system, whether of high or low voltage. If of high voltage, 55 to 60 cells are needed. The low-voltage battery of 15 or 16 cells is the one ordinarily used and is the best for general farm purposes, since it is smaller, much less expensive and provides a current which can be handled with safety by the amateur.

The distribution system consists of the lamps, wiring and switchboard which are always furnished with the outfit if any of the standard farm plants are purchased. It is not a difficult matter for the farmer to do his own wiring if he understands the principles.

How to Wire the House

Two parallel wires are run three or four inches apart and the lamps are strung in between so that the current can cut across from one wire to the other. As large covered copper wires as possible should be used. The wires should be covered or insulated so as to keep the current from escaping by short circuits. They should be of copper because copper is the best metal to conduct electricity. They should be large because small wires are so high in resistance that a weak current flows over them. Very large wire, however, is so expensive that it is impractical. For the average farm, number 10 to 14 wire is about the right size.

A STYLISH, SERVICEABLE SILO.

Electrical Conveniences

Lucky the housewife who has electricity on the farm.

The electrical conveniences and the many labor-saving devices possible, make housework so much easier that it is like having an ever-faithful servant at command.

During the short days of winter when so much labor must be done by lamplight, a bright light which can be turned on, at a touch, in every room in the house makes the work a half easier. No carrying around lamps and no stumbling around in the dark.

Electric Washer

Blue Monday is done away with by an electric washer. Washings are always the most dreaded job on the farm. The men's clothes are so heavy to wash by hand and the ordinary hand washing machine requires so much strength before the clothes are clean. Then many times they cannot be turned fast enough to properly cleanse the clothes.

The electric washer does away with all this. The clothes are put in, the washer started and no more attention need be paid to it till the clothes are ready to rinse—then by switching the current on the wringer, the only labor that is required is to hang them up.

The Electric Iron

Another hard job is the ironing. An electric iron means a cool kitchen—a constant, evenly-heated iron and no trotting back and forth to the stove when an iron cools.

The ironing can be done on a cool porch, during hot weather, and if the housewife adds a high stool to her kitchen equipment she can sit down and take it easy.

Electric Vacuum Cleaner

The electric vacuum cleaner almost completely solves the cleaning problem in the living-room, dining-room and bedrooms.

It not only picks up the surface dirt and lint, thread or hair, but it draws the dirt out under the surface of the rugs where it is impossible to get at it with a broom.

With the cleaner come various attachments for cleaning the upholstery, the draperies and the bedding.

Besides being a great labor-saving device it does away with the dust choked air, caused by a broom, that is so harmful to the good health of the household. Broom sweeping merely stirs up the dirt and distributes it all over everything in the room, where, after the most careful dusting only a part of the dirt is removed.

With the vacuum cleaner, the great volume of air rushing through the nozzle sucks up the dirt and deposits it in a dust-proof bag which can be emptied out of doors.

The vacuum cleaner keeps the house clean, wholesome and sanitary.

Other Conveniences

Then there are many other electrical conveniences for the home that are real luxuries—the toaster, the coffee percolator, the foot warmers—but it is impossible to name all the home labor-saving equipment possible by having an electric farm lighting outfit.

The Farm Water Supply

Few farms are favored with springs or running water and few of those that are, have piped this natural supply into the house and barn. But every farm must have water, and every farm may have running water, in both house and barn. No one who has ever had such a convenience will be without it, no matter what it costs. But the best of it is that the cost is less than that of many labor-saving machines which are found on farms for use only a few days in the year. Water is used many times a day in both house and barn every day in the year!

The Hydraulic Ram

If there's a running stream of water on the place that can be dammed so there will be a fall of a foot or two, a hydraulic ram which works automatically will push it up hill through a small pipe into the house or anywhere it is wanted. The cost is small and the convenience great.

The Storage Tank

Storage tanks are usually placed either in the attic, on the windmill or on top of the silo where the water will fall by gravity anywhere it is wanted, or else under pressure in the cellar. The pressure tank is kept partly filled with compressed air, which forces the water through the pipes wherever wanted. The advantage of the pressure tank is that the water is usually kept cooler and is better for drinking purposes. Whether the gravity or the pressure tank is used, the water must be forced into it by use of a force pump, which may be operated by a windmill or gasolene or kerosene engine.

Water Fresh from the Well

Another type of pressure system is often used which stores air in a big tank under high pressure. This pressure tank is connected by a pipe to an under-water pump in the well, which works automatically. When the tap at the house or barn is opened the pump starts and thus lifts the fresh water directly from the well, and stops pumping as soon as the tap is closed.

How Water Is Distributed

No matter what kind of a water supply system is used it is distributed through pipes in or near the walls to the kitchen and bathrooms of the house and to the tank and drinking cups for cattle in the barn. The only care that needs to be taken is to keep the pipes from freezing. For this reason they should never be run near outside walls and should always be buried outside—sufficiently deep to escape the frost.

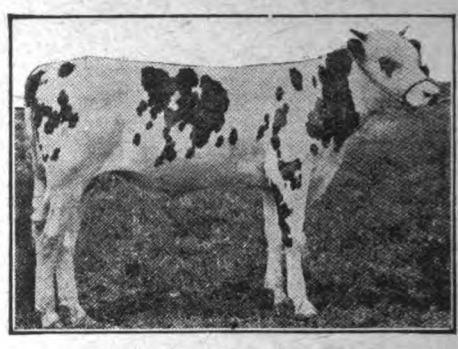
With running water in the house it is possible to have a supply of both hot and cold water always available at the kitchen sink. Hot water is obtained by putting a brass or iron coil in the fire-box of the kitchen stove or the furnace, whichever is used. This coil is connected by a pipe with a tank in which the hot water is stored until needed for use.

The Bathroom

This is the one city luxury which so few farmers do have but which all may. The first requisite for a bathroom is running water in the house. The next is some means of sewage disposal. No farmer who has, or can install, running water, should fail to put in a complete bathroom, including tub, set bowl, and toilet (flush closet). The tub and set bowl should, of course, be connected with both the hot and cold water pipes. Besides the joy and luxury of the nice warm bath in a big tub at the end of a sweaty day's work, there is the added convenience of the set bowl for washing hands and the flush closet so important to health. This is particularly appreciated during the cold winter weather or during sickness in the house. Besides being exceedingly disagreeable and uncomfortable, the old-fashioned outhouse is exceedingly unsanitary and unhealthful. These should be speedily replaced on every farm by a nice, clean, comfortable toilet and bathroom in the house.

How Dispose of Sewage

The waste from the bathroom, toilet and kitchen sink can easily be disposed of in either of two ways, by a cesspool or a septic tank. Whether a cesspool or a septic tank should be used will depend upon conditions, such as the slope of the land, the kind of soil, nearness to the well, etc.



When the Cesspool Can Be Used

The cesspool can be used when it can be located in sloping ground considerably lower than the well and at some distance—say a hundred feet or so—and then in no possible danger of contamination of the well from the cesspool. It is a good precaution to encase the opening to the well in an iron pipe coming above the top of the ground and extending deep down into it and the top surrounded by a good concrete platform.

But a cesspool to be effective must drain out rapidly, otherwise it may easily become a nuisance. To drain out it must be either in sand or gravel. When it is easy to get down to sand or gravel it is easy to build a cesspool. But in clay or heavy soil a cesspool is not advised.

The Septic Tank

The septic tank is usually made of concrete, with a partition across near one end separating it into two parts. The large end receives the waste from the house, which it gradually discharges into the small tank when it becomes completely liquefied. When the small tank becomes filled it automatically empties into the drain tiles which are laid a foot or so under the surface of the garden or other nearby area. Where the soil is very dense as in clay, it is sometimes necessary to place a few inches of sand or cinders under the tile so that they will drain out rapidly. Ordinary drainage tile is used for this purpose.

A PROMISING PURE-BRED BULL CALF.

The Association of Cement Manufacturers have published a very valuable bulletin which may be had for the asking by writing their office at Chicago. Besides this, several state agricultural colleges have prepared bulletins on the same subject.

The Heating Plant

Neither a water supply or sewage disposal system can be installed in a poorly heated house. There are many types of farm heating plants among which the pipeless furnace is now having a big run. It is both cheap and efficient. Send for bulletins and catalogues of lighting, heating and water supply plants if you are interested. They will furnish you a lot of valuable information.

A Place to Keep Milk

Have you a good milk house on your farm? If not, then why not one of concrete? With a good water supply so that a tank can be put in one end for cooling the milk or cream, concrete makes the best possible material for a milk house. It is cool and can be kept clean and perfectly sanitary. Every dairy farmer should have a good clean place to keep milk and cream both winter and summer. A milk house made of tile or concrete is just the thing.

Kitchen Conveniences

The good man of the house should realize that the kitchen is a big factor in the success or failure of his business.

A smooth running kitchen—well equipped with modern conveniences—means time to prepare better meals, a saving in household supplies, ability to cut out needless waste, and above all, economy of strength and effort that is so vital to the health and happiness of the good wife.

A kitchen equipped as it should be results in labor saving that reacts on every member of the household. The more time saved by conveniences the more time that can be given to the selection of food and the appetizing ways of serving it.

On a farm, good, clean, wholesome meals mean keeping not only the family happier but often decides whether the hired man will stay on his job. It's not only the wages paid but the board that he gets that decides whether he will be hunting another place or not.

Water in Kitchen and Sewage Disposal

The first thing in equipping a kitchen is to see that there is water in it. If not on tap, at least a pump and a sink can be installed. Every kitchen should have both soft and hard water. It is just as easy to install a pump in the kitchen as in the yard. Pump from the well or cistern directly into the sink. Don't ask an overburdened wife to carry in the water. No farmer carries water to his stock—then why ask the wife to carry water for the family cooking and cleaning.

It is astonishing how many pails of water are needed during the day. Until water is installed one little realizes how an abundance of water means a lessening of kitchen labor.

Vegetables are especially hard to prepare—they need so much washing and rinsing—a pail of water is just a beginning for washing the day's supply.

When water is installed, of equal importance is the sewage disposal. Have a place to dispose of the water. Drain the sink out of doors by means of a pipe. Run the pipe far enough away from the house that odor and flies will not bother. Better a cesspool—or an underground disposal connected with a septic tank.

The water and sewage disposal and its installing comes under a man's work and is as much a part of the house as its cupboards, closets or heating plant. Most women are too self-sacrificing and would not think of demanding the conveniences for her work that her husband thinks absolutely necessary for his.

Water and its disposal should be in every kitchen. It means less and easier work, time saved, cleaner home, and, greatest of all, the housewife is not made a beast of burden in trying to do her share of the labor of the farm.

NEWLY WED, Mont.—You should know best whether or not you can trust your husband. We can say that it is right you should try to have no doubts of his faithfulness while away, and that if you are "newly wed" it is well to know that love and trust must go together. (2) It is not necessary that you remain away from all forms of entertainment during your husband's absence but it is well to avoid any cause for reproach or gossip, and you would do best to attend all kinds of amusement in the company of married women who are your friends.

A. G., Corpus Christi, Texas.—When someone expresses regret at your absence from an entertainment, you might say: "Thank you; it is nice to know that I was missed." (2) As you knew from his sister that this boy was yet single, you might have said in answer to his harmless joking: "It is strange that your sister told me you were not married."

C. W., Ellamore, W. Va.—No girl can consider herself engaged unless she has been definitely asked to marry some man, and has given her promise to become his wife. Any talk of a fifteen-year-old girl being engaged is both wrong and ridiculous. (2) You should not have accepted so costly a gift as a wrist watch from this young man.

MAYME AND FANNY, Texas.—When a boy "squeezes a girl's hand and smiles at her," it means that he would like to have her squeeze his hand and smile back—and some girls are foolish enough to do this. (2) A boy and girl should not "hold hands" while out walking "in the daytime," nor at any other time.

L. H., Cato, Wis.—When a boy takes a girl to an "ice cream parlor," each is free to order the dish or flavor preferred—the girl giving her order first.

TROUBLED TWINS, Linn Grove, Ia.—Of course you must expect to be "troubled" if you are but sixteen and are attempting to oppose the wisdom and experience of your parents with your own young and foolish wishes. If your parents do not approve of these young men, you must not continue to receive their attentions. This may make you a little unhappy now, but when you are older you will know that your parents acted for the best. (2) No girls of sixteen—or older—should attend "public dances" and return home at two in the morning.

BROWN EYES OF COLORADO.—We remember reading, "There is nothing hidden that shall not be revealed," and this certainly applies to children who attempt the concealment of something from their parents. When you started to correspond with this boy, you knew that your father would be displeased should he find it out, and now it seems to us that you can only accept his displeasure and charge it up against the fun you think you had from the concealed correspondence. However, your letter is a sensible one and we are not unsympathetic to your difficulty. Perhaps the boy will turn out to be just as fine a character as you think he is, and if this should be true, it should largely lighten your scolding. And if he is the wrong sort of a boy, it is best that your father's wrath should end the circumstance. Do not meet the boy at the train, but let him call to see you at your home, or that of some married woman who is your friend. We hope you will not make a mistake of this sort again.

TWO CHUMS, Durham, N. C.—It is best that you should be chaperoned in attending any entertainment with this young man whom you have known for so short a time. (2) We do not think any girl should want to "tangle" her hair in attempting to follow some certain style of hair dressing, and if you and your chum are as young as we think you are, you will do best and keep yourself more attractive by arranging your hair in simple schoolgirl fashion.

A. D., Cementon, Pa.—You should have this spot or "birthmark" looked at by a physician or a dermatologist if you seriously wish to have it removed. It should be possible to do this if the spot is small as you say.

D. A., Anderson, S. C.—Because you have "never kept house" before is no reason to believe you might not like it nor learn to do it well. We believe it to be a wife's duty to follow her husband to such a home as he may select or be able to furnish. Why not compromise your doubts and objections by pleasantly agreeing to try the new home and way of living for a year at least before you are sure of your unhappiness and dissatisfaction. Remember your husband's part in the war and the discomforts and dangers he endured in France—and read also the words of the ceremony which made you man and wife.

BIG EYES, Montana.—We do not think it is kind to "go" with a young man to make another girl "very jealous." We think you would do best to follow your own suggestion of seeking another escort.

SWEET WILLIAM, Garner, Texas.—We do not know how nice this "nice young man" may be, but we do know that a girl of seventeen—who is still at school—must be governed in her conduct according to her parents' judgment and wishes. Perhaps if you worried less about this young man you would learn better how to spell. There will be plenty of time for "nice young men" after you have courted with your school books a bit longer.

TOPSY, Okla.—After he has brought you home, you may thank the young man for having taken you to the entertainment and tell him that you have had a very good time. (2) Certainly you may ask a young man to call again, and you need not wait for him to request the privilege.

E. J., Kingsport, Tenn.—Certainly a new pair of gloves should not be "cut all to pieces," and if this is what the young man threatens to do with his gift, you will be wise not to return it. You have done your part in offering to give back the gloves and asking him for an explanation of his strange conduct. We think the next move should be his.

BLUE EYES, Martinsburg, Nebr.—The burning and redness of your face, particularly at night, may be due to your being much out of doors and having your skin exposed to the cold. Anyone who is physically strong and fullblooded is more subject to such skin conditions. Use some good cold cream on your face before walking or driving in the winter air, and upon your return indoors, wet a towel in hot water and go over your skin with more cold cream which you have placed upon the hot towel. If you live in the country, and can procure it, you will find buttermilk one of the best skin lotions for red or roughened complexion. Put this on your face upon retiring, and let it dry on the skin.

ANXIOUS, Gorman, Tex.—A simple "yes" or "no" is correct and sufficient.

trouble, add one teaspoonful of magnesia to one pint of drinking water every third day for two weeks. Decrease the amount of corn, feeding more oats to take its place.

M. R. M.—Yes, ducks and geese can be hatched in an incubator, but unless you want to raise large quantities, I advise you to set the first duck and goose eggs under common hens, and let the old geese keep their second clutch of eggs to raise themselves. A common hen can only successfully cover five goose eggs, and eleven duck eggs.

A READER.—At the end of the first part of this month's department you will find a good lice exterminator. I have found that wrapping a piece of paper around the stalk of young cabbage plants when setting them out, prevents cutworms from injuring them. The paper must be long enough to reach half an inch below the soil, and one inch above it. Wrap it loosely two or three times around the stalk.

R. T. S.—We have no book on Rhode Island Reds, so I cannot comply with your request.

C. E. H.—If your local hardware or drug store cannot get you a hygrometer, send to the Taylor Instrument Companies, Rochester, N. Y. The hygrometer should be placed in front of the egg tray in the make of incubator you are using. There is a scale printed on the dial of the hygrometer, which is just as easy to read as the scale on the thermometer.

R. C. F.—As you say that, according to the thermometer, the temperature in the incubator was at the correct degree all through the hatching period, I can only suggest that the thermometer was not working properly. Better get your doctor to compare it with his thermometer, or take it to a drug store.

W. S.—Without doubt, your flock has got roup. Please read answer to A. B. in this issue. Roup is a contagious disease, which frequently develops from a cold. It may have been carried to your flock from some neighbor's poultry, or some of your birds may have inherited roupy tendencies, which develop into active form and spread from bird to bird.

L. R. C.—I am very sorry there was a mistake in answering your previous letter, and very glad that you wrote again. Turkey and goose eggs can be hatched in an incubator, but I prefer setting them under hens. One drake will mate with five ducks. I prefer two and three-year-old ducks for breeders. There is a difference between the cry of a gander and a goose, and, as a rule, the gander is more upright in carriage. It is important that the heat in an incubator is kept up at hatching time. I don't like it to go above 105½, but if it runs up to 110 for a short time when the birds are coming out very quickly, it won't do any harm. I really don't think there is any preference between hot air and hot water machines.

J. A. W.—Feather pulling is a bad habit, and difficult to cure when once established in a flock. Give the birds free range if possible, if not, put a lot of chopped straw and green stalks on the floor of the house, and feed the grain scattered over the litter, so that it will take their time to hunt over it. Instead of corn and wheat, use commercial scratch feed; or, if you can't get that, oats or Kaffir corn or cracked corn. Make a salve of bitter aloes and lard or vaseline, and rub it on the feathers all round the spot from which they have been pulling feathers. Perhaps the young gobbler has got some poisonous substance, or is just starting with blackhead. Better keep him away from the other birds until you know what is really the matter.

A. B.—The birds had roup, which is very contagious. Clean and disinfect the poultry house and fixtures. Burn up all the old litter, scrape the floor, scatter fresh lime over it, then whitewash the walls and ceiling. Watch your remaining birds very carefully. If any show signs of cold, remove them from the flock at once, and place them in small coops as far away from the chicken house as possible. Dissolve one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in a quart of water. For use, dilute one tablespoonful of the lotion with two tablespoonfuls of water. Fill a small glass syringe and spray the bird's eyes, nostrils and throat three times a day. Feed on light, nourishing food, giving small quantities four times a day.

F. W.—I have never had a crowing hen. Don't you think there may be some mistake? You say that the crow sounds smothered, as if a rooster had his head under his wing. Perhaps one of the hens has got bronchitis, or some obstruction in the nasal passage or throat. Better take an early morning trip to the chicken house, and watch and listen. If at close range it only proves to be a croaky sound, locate the hen, remove her from the henhouse, and put her in a quarantine house; then use permanganate of potassium as recommended to A. B.

M. J. F.—To make a fireless brooder out of a lard tub, cut a square hole at one side near the bottom for chicks to go in and out. Fix a cleat on the inside of the tub, four or five inches from the bottom. Take a piece of stroug wire, such as you would use for clothesline) long enough to form a circle, which will fit into the tub and rest on the cleats. Cover it with unbleached muslin, then place on the cleats. Make a round pillow, the same size as the frame, and stuff with cotton or feathers. The pillow should be made with the casing three inches between the top and the bottom, so that the pillow will be three inches thick all over. Place it on the top of the frame, and your brooder is finished. The bottom of the tub must be covered with finely chopped hay to make a soft bed for the chicks, and also to prevent the droppings from sticking to the bottom of the tub. Clean, and put in fresh hay over it. Also, take out the pillow and hang it up to dry every day. It will surprise you to see how much moisture it absorbs during the night. A small frame covered with muslin should be made to close the front opening, at night. Such a brooder must be used in a tight, warm coop, or brought into the kitchen at night.

First aid in every household —Musterole

Cough, cough, cough. How it racks little Dorothy and passes on to mother and grandma and holds a croup danger for all the little ones!

Hurry, there, with the Musterole, that pure, white ointment that is better than a mustard plaster—and it will not bring a blister. Massage it gently over the chest and neck. Feel the tingle, then the cool delightfulness as Musterole searches down. It will penetrate, never fear. It will rout that old congestion clear away.

Musterole is a pure, white ointment made from oil of mustard and a few home simples! Musterole searches in under the skin down to the heart of the congestion. There it generates a peculiar congestion-dispersing heat. Yet this heat will not blister. On the contrary you feel a relieving sense of delightful coolness. Rub Musterole over the spot. And you get relief while you use it; for Musterole results usually follow immediately.

On no account fail to have a jar of Musterole handy. For coughs and colds and even the congestions of rheumatism or lumbago Musterole is wonderful.

Many doctors and nurses recommend Musterole.

At last she heard her go out, and knew that she would not return until nearly six o'clock. She had heard Wilhelm go out, also, directly after dinner, and, for the first time during her imprisonment, she was glad to be alone in the house.

She immediately began to experiment upon her key. She imagined that it would be a comparatively easy thing to turn it, but she found, to her disappointment, that it resisted all her efforts; she would get it about half turned, when the spring of the lock would force it back into its former position.

For more than two hours she worked, until her fingers and arms ached, and her courage was about expended; but at last, by a dextrous movement, she turned the key completely around, and her way from the room was clear.

Opening the door, she found herself in a long and narrow hall, shabby in the extreme from marred paint and torn paper; the floor carpetless, the ceiling grimy and hung with cobwebs, while at the farther end there was a window, several of the panes of which had been broken and the holes pasted over with thick brown paper.

Approaching this, Violet looked out upon a row of untidy back yards; other back yards, belonging to another row of houses, joined these, and all the dwellings seemed to be alike in that vicinity.

Glancing at the roofs, which were flat, she saw that there were arrangements upon them for hanging out clothes, and surmised that there must be scuttles leading out upon them.

Retracing her steps, and going to the opposite end of the hall, she found there a staircase leading up into another story. Mounting these, she came to a hall similar to the one below, and another very steep flight of stairs that led directly to a scuttle—a circumstance which she noted with a thrill of joy.

She crept carefully up to the top and found that the cover to the scuttle was fastened only by a flat strip of iron about three feet long, in which there were several slots, for a bolt, so that it could be raised high or low at will.

She tried it, and found that it opened very easily.

Going up a couple of steps more, she put her head out of the opening and looked about her.

She saw a continuous roof for a long distance, with scuttles at intervals, and a perfect network of clothes-lines above, upon some of which clothes were flapping in the wind.

There would be considerable risk, she thought, to try to escape by the way of this roof, still she believed that she would find an open scuttle somewhere, through which she would make her entrance to another house, when she would trust to her native tact to get out upon the street.

The day was cloudy, but it was still too light to attempt her flight—she felt it would be better to wait until it began to grow dark, so that she would not be seen upon the roof and traced.

She returned to her room and waited for another hour; but she was very nervous and anxious, for Wilhelm might return at any moment, and thus all hope of getting away that day would be destroyed and her trick of turning the key probably discovered.

She dressed herself warmly, and tied a veil over her cap, but not over her face, for she knew that she would need to see distinctly, and then, making sure that she had her purse, in which, fortunately, there was considerable money, she left her recent prison forever, taking care to lock the door and remove the key, for she meant to give her captors as much trouble as possible before they could discover her flight.

With light but rapid steps and an anxiously beating heart she again mounted the two flights of stairs leading to the roof, and in another minute found herself free, breathing the pure air of heaven once more.

She resolved to get just as far away as possible from the house she had just left, before attempting an entrance elsewhere, and so she sped lightly over the roofs until she came to the middle of the block.

Here she discovered that an open space separated the two buildings.

"Dare I leap across?" Violet asked herself. "It looks like a very narrow opening, and yet distances are sometimes so deceptive, and if I should miss my footing I should surely be dashed in pieces upon the pavement below."

She crept to the very edge and reached out her hand.

Yes, she could almost touch the opposite roof—the two buildings could not be more than three or four feet apart, where the eaves overhung, though doubtless they were more than that below.

She stood up again, gave a light, swift spring, and was safely over, though the effort and the risk made her so dizzy and weak that she could scarcely see or move for a moment.

She soon recovered herself and went on until she came to the very last scuttle, only to find it down and fastened inside; she had not seen a single one open since coming out.

She did not wait long before deciding what she would do; time was too precious to be wasted, for Sarah must already be on her way back to prepare her supper, and she wanted to get out of sight before the search for her should begin.

So she resolutely set her little heel upon a pane of glass and crushed it in.

The jingle of glass startled her for a moment, for she feared the sound might bring some one up to ascertain what had caused it. But she would pay for it a dozen times over if need be.

She reached down through the aperture, unfastened the bolt, and lifted the scuttle; then quickly slipping through, she closed it after her and began to descend the narrow flight of stairs, thankful to be under cover and out of sight once more.

MRS. H. O. L., Minnesota.—If, as you state, you can establish by the proper evidence that your adjoining neighbor has built his fence on your side of the line of ownership, you can compel him to remove same in the proper ejectment action brought for that purpose; we think, however, before bringing such action you should make sure that your title to the land is a better title than he can show as in such an action it will be necessary for you to show that your survey of the property is correct, and that you obtained title to the property through owners whose title was paramount to any title he can show to the property, and that he has not acquired title by possession to the property.

M. E. P., Virginia.—Upon your statements, we are of the opinion that the young man you mention would be entitled to recover such sums, as he can show by the proper evidence, he loaned his father together with legal interest thereon.

MRS. B. M., Kansas.—Under the laws of Oklahoma, we are of the opinion that the consent of children is not necessary for the sale of property belonging to their father.

R. M. F., New Hampshire.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, and upon waiving the provisions of any will he may leave, and upon waiving dower and homestead rights in his real estate, you would be entitled to receive one third of the real and personal estate if he leaves issue by your marriage to him. If he leaves no issue, you would be entitled to fifteen hundred dollars if the estate does not exceed three thousand dollars, or one half of the estate where the value is in excess of three thousand dollars.

J. S. B., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it would have been necessary for the wife of the man you mention to have survived him in order to have acquired an interest in his property, and that upon her death he could mortgage or convey his real estate without the consent of their children.

MRS. P. E. D., Montrose.—If your mail carrier does not properly deliver your mail you should make your complaint to the Post-Office Department.

M. M., Kansas.—If you have instructed your lawyer to foreclose the mortgage you mention, and if there has been a default in the payments required to be made you by the terms of the mortgage, and if your attorney refuses or neglects to proceed with the foreclosure action, we think you should employ some other attorney to attend to the matter for you. (2) If the administrator of your uncle's estate refuses to account to you, we think you should proceed against him to compel him to account.

M. E. S., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that you should make an application to the court to compel the guardian of the small children you mention to apply a sufficient amount of their income to their support, if they are without other means of support.

C. F. P., North Carolina.—If the property you mention legally belonged to the man you state stole some money and ran away, we think, upon his death, it would, after the payment of his debts, including the persons from whom he stole, go as provided in his will.

MRS. A. G. O., Oregon.—Under the laws of Massachusetts, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married woman, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, her surviving husband would receive her whole estate up to five thousand dollars in value and one half of the excess above this amount, the balance of the estate going to her kindred; if none such, the whole estate would go to her surviving husband.

MRS. R. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the claim, of the father of the children you mention, to the custody of such children is prior to the claim of the dead mother's relatives, unless some court of competent jurisdiction has decreed, upon proper evidence, that such father is not a fit person to have such custody.

W. J. M., Montana.—If you can establish by the proper evidence that the injury to your son was caused by the negligence of the driver of the horses you mention, and if you can establish that the owner of these horses knew they were not broken when he sent them out, and if your son was not guilty of any contributory negligence in connection with the accident, we think you can recover such damages as you can prove you have suffered by reason thereof, in the proper action brought for that purpose against the owner of the horses.

C. H., Indiana.—The Constitution of the United States does not prohibit any one from holding the presidency of the United States for a third term.

O. R. E., South Dakota.—If the present owner of the real estate you mention obtained title to the same before the taxes you mention become a lien upon the property, we think he should pay the taxes, and not the former owner thereof.

MRS. I. P. H., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that title to property, given by a husband to his wife, would not be affected by his death; it would remain her property, and would not be an asset of his estate. (2) We think that the proceeds of a life insurance policy, upon the death of the person insured, are payable to the beneficiary named in the policy.

MRS. B. E. B., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the man who purchased the furniture and gave his note for same obtained ownership to such furniture, and that the former owner could not now claim ownership of same, unless he took a chattel mortgage upon the property, and foreclosed same, and in that way regained ownership of said furniture. In the absence of a chattel mortgage, we think the former owner should bring suit upon the notes given in payment for the furniture, in order to enforce his claim for the money still due him.

MRS. C. M. F., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, if his surviving widow has a child born of the marriage, living at the death of her husband, she may elect to take a child's share absolutely in the real estate of her deceased husband in lieu of dower, subject to the payment of her husband's debts; except for this provision and some minor allowances, we think the husband can by will bar his widow from any share in his estate except her dower rights in his real estate. We think that marriage would be a good consideration upon which to base a contract providing certain money or property to go to the wife in case she survives the husband. Such contract must be in writing, and should be carefully drawn; if there is any question that the husband might dispose of the property during his lifetime, it should be turned over to some reliable Trust Company to hold as trustee. Marriage contracts of this nature are not much used in this country.

MRS. S. L. G., Idaho.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his surviving widow would receive the entire community property, and one half of his separate property, the other half going to his parents. There is an inheritance tax in your state, assessed upon a graduated scale above certain exemptions, and in addition to that there is a Federal inheritance tax upon estates above $50,000. This is also assessed upon a graduating scale, increasing at various stages as the value of the estate exceeds certain amounts.

MRS. C. D. H., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your signature is not necessary for the conveyance of real estate by your husband, unless such real estate is homestead property.

C. L.—If, as you state, the widow of the man you mention has only a life estate in the property you mention, we do not think she has a legal right to cut and sell the timber from the property without the consent of the persons entitled to the remainder interest, except that she would be entitled to cut and use firewood and such other timber as the maintenance and care of the property might require, provided she does not cut timber for sale.

MRS. H. L., West Virginia.—If the property you mention was deeded to you, we think you would be foolish to sell same and divide the proceeds with your husband, if, as you state, he is preparing to leave you again; we think you would exercise better judgment in letting him go empty handed, unless, of course, you want him to leave you, and feel that he is entitled to a share of the property.

The Happiest Married Couple I Have Ever Known!

Wherever They Go People Turn to Admire and Say to Themselves "I Wish I Knew Their Secret of Happiness"

EVERYBODY in our city shook their heads with a sigh when Jim Thomas married Ruth Holmes. Not that they didn't like Jim and Ruth, but anyone that knew them both would have said that they didn't have one chance in a thousand of making their married life a happy and successful one.

Ruth was a mighty attractive looking girl, the daughter of John Holmes, the druggist. But ever since birth she had been frail and delicate. And Jim was no robust specimen of manhood. Since he has been working in the tire factory's office he seemed even taller and thinner and more sallow than ever.

Starting married life under such a serious handicap, it naturally looked as though Jim and Ruth were in for a mighty hard, up-hill struggle.

But that was five years ago. Today, Jim and Ruth Thomas are the happiest married couple I have ever known. They are both healthy and vigorous. They have prospered. They have two of the darlingest, chubby little children you ever saw. They are the leaders in our younger social set and are envied by every other married couple in our town.

They Learned the Secret of Happiness—Early

Ruth Thomas told me all about their early struggles with married life, while I was taking tea with her the other afternoon, on the sun-porch of their beautiful new Colonial house. And here is her story just as she told it to me:

"You know," she said, "that ever since I was a girl I have been afflicted with terrible, nervous, sick headaches. After Jim and I were married there was hardly a week went by that I wasn't stricken with one of those severe, nerve-racking attacks.

"When one of these spells would come on, I would be nauseated, deathly sick and prostrated for hours. The misery and pain that I suffered would be almost unbearable. And then after they would pass off, I would be worn out, nervous, irritable and blue for days.

"And Jim, the poor boy, I hardly see how he stood it. He had troubles of his own. He wasn't any too strong. And he was working harder than ever at the office with no outdoor exercise. His appetite was poor and he was bothered with indigestion, biliousness and habitual constipation.

"Naturally, under these conditions, I was irritable and nervous, and Jim was cross and discouraged. Things seemed to go from bad to worse, so that the first six months of our married life were just like a nightmare.

They Found That Health Was the Keynote of Happiness

"And then one evening as I was recovering from one of my attacks and Jim was sitting on the couch beside me, we had a good heart-to-heart talk about our troubles.

"Right then and there we made up our minds that if we were going to be happy, we would have to get rid of the chronic ailments that were wrecking our lives and spoiling our dispositions. We decided that health was the first essential to our happiness and that we both would have to be healthy before we could make our married life a happy and successful one.

"Father had told me some time before about a well-known preparation that he had sold in his drug store for years. So the next day I phoned him and he sent me a package of Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills for my headaches.

"The first package helped me. You cannot imagine what a wonderful relief they gave me. I used them regularly for some time and it wasn't long until I was free from those excruciating headaches. Today, I rarely have an attack.

"I urged Jim to try Dr. Miles' Liver Pills for his troubles and within a few weeks he was a changed man. From that time on we both began to know what real health and real happiness meant.

And Happiness Was Half the Battle to Success

"As our health grew, our prosperity grew. Jim was promoted to the sales department a year later, and last year he was made sales manager of the tire company.

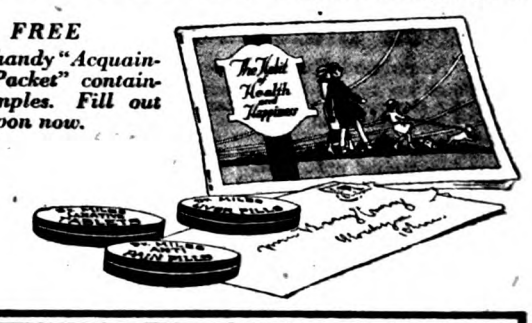
"Why, even today, I keep a supply of Dr. Miles' reliable remedies always on hand. We give Jim junior and little Betty Dr. Miles' Laxative Tablets. The children just love them. They taste like candy and are so mild, soothing and effective.

"Father says that Dr. Miles' Remedies are absolutely safe and harmless for both young or old because they contain no opiates or habit-forming drugs whatever. He has sold them in the drug store for years. He tells me there are hundreds of people right here in our city that have used them with equally as good results as we have had.

"I believe that I can truthfully say that the relief and help which we have received from Dr. Miles' medicines are largely responsible for our success. They helped us acquire health. Health brought us happiness and happiness brought prosperity."

You, Too, Can Get the Habit of Health and Happiness

If you are run down and subject to headaches, and other common ills, constipation and kindred chronic disorders go to your druggist, and get the Dr. Miles' Remedy that is best suited to your needs. You can try them without any risk on your part whatever. If you receive no benefit, take the empty package back and your druggist will refund your money.



Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills cost 30c for 25 doses. Dr. Miles' Liver Pills cost 30c for 50 doses. Dr. Miles' Laxative (Candy-like) Tablets cost 30c for 25 tablets. Sold by drug stores everywhere.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

H. N., Moscow, Miss.—To attempt to re-back your mirror at home by the use of quicksilver would be an experiment of such difficulty that we cannot advise you to try it.

R. H., Badin, N. C.—Write to the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., for information concerning positions in the Forestry Service.

MRS. G. M. V., Bliss, Ida.—For the light refreshments needed at your sewing club, serve lettuce sandwiches made with a mayonnaise dressing and other sandwiches of which the filling is a mixture of chopped nuts and raisins. Have your bread for these sandwiches lightly buttered and cut thin in diamond shape. Serve either tea or chocolate, and have small individual cakes with orange, almond and chocolate icings. (2) The magazine you ask about is published at 95 Madison Ave., New York City.

MRS. E. T., Richmond, O.—Your violin would be a valuable instrument if it was one that had been actually made by Stradivarius in the year 1716. But the fact is that very few of these mastermade violins are in existence, and all of these are known by experts. It seems certain that your instrument is but a product of the fraudulent "old violin" industry, concerning which we have written so often in this column in answer to COMFORT readers who have purchased instruments in which a false inscription had been placed to deceive buyers regarding the age and quality of the violin.

E. M., Wever, Ia.—Write to the Secretary of the Camp Fire Girls of America, 37 East 17th St., New York City.

A FRIEND, Prentice, Wis.—The imperfect speech of one who stammers is sometimes the result of irregular and spasmodic action of the throat muscles—which action is largely mental in its cause. Fear, anger and embarrassment all increase a stammerer's troubles as a result of the part the nerves and the mental state play in controlling the throat organs of speech. There is apt to be a stuttering repetition of words beginning with the consonant sounds B, P, T and D, which seem to be particularly hard for the nervous throat muscles to handle. There are said to be five times as many men who stammer as there are women thus afflicted. Anything which improves your health of mind and body will aid your case. We advise you to get as much out-of-door exercise as possible. Try to form the best of mental and moral habits, all of which will help you more than you think. Try speaking as firmly as you can and in calm, measured tones. Sometimes the motion of the hand or foot in time to the words will aid in speaking.

B. S., Youngsville, Pa.—Paraffin is found native in connection with some mineral and as a constituent part of certain bituminous deposits and mineral oils from which it is extracted by distillation. A great deal of paraffin is manufactured in Scotland, where a chemist by the name of James Young first started the industry in 1851. Germany has also supplied much of the product, as well as our own Standard Oil Company in this country. You would not find it possible to make your own paraffin, but it is not expensive to purchase—in such quantities as are used in the ordinary household routine.

R. F., Rock Rapids, Ia.—Some metals are almost infusible and even when heated to the highest point refuse to melt. Aluminum, however, is not one of these, and the metal will melt at 654.5 Centigrade. The addition of either tin or zinc would cause the aluminum to melt at a lower degree of heat than that which we have stated.

MRS. L. W., Wilmington, (?).—We believe this boy will have to serve out his enlistment. Write to the Bureau of Navigation, Washington, D. C. Be sure and add the name of your state—which you failed to do in your letter to this department.

B. M. D., Albertville, Ala.—You do not state your age, or if you mean schools which furnish specialized courses. The advantages of any grammar or high school would be yours without charge, if you made your home in any village or city having such educational facilities. It is possible for a student to "work her way" through many of our well-known colleges for girls. But we judge from your letter that you are in search of more elementary training than that of a university.

C. A. P., Rollwitz, Nebr.—There are 20,721,658 acres of vacant public land in Wyoming. If you are but sixteen years of age, any homestead claim would have to be filed in the name of your father. For necessary particulars write to W. Reid, Register of U. S. Land Office, Cheyenne, Wyo.

B. B., Lusk, Wyo.—In 1582 the old Julian Calendar was succeeded by the present Gregorian Calendar. This calendar was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII for the purpose of keeping the Equinox to the same day of the month. It was a ruling of the Gregorian Calendar that, of the centurial years, only those were to be of 366 days which could be exactly divided by 400. Thus the year 1900 was not a Leap Year and eight years elapsed between 1896 and the next year of 366 days, 1904.

J. A., Owings, W. Va.—There are but 300,599 acres of public land remanining vacant in the state of Arkansas. We fear that little of this would be of value for general farming. Sevier county in the western part of the state has good farming and fruit raising sections. DeQueen is the county seat. For particulars of the remaining vacant lands which might be homesteaded, write to J. L. Clendenin, Register of U. S. Land Office, Harrison, Arkansas.

COMFORT READER, Young America, Minn.—This department has no information regarding banks which pay "interest above six per cent." We do not believe that any bank could do business safely and legitimately on any such basis.

Z. Z. Z., Va.—Write to the U. S. Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C., asking for particulars of positions open in the Federal service for rodmen and chainmen. The information sent you by the commission will cover the matter of salary paid for various positions.

Driven Apart

a curious, steady dog trot. Japanese, Italians, negroes, were likewise in that fleeing procession, and over all was the scrape, scrape, scrape of trunks as their owners dragged them westward.

There were no complaints, no wailing against this heavy visitation of misfortune; every face was set with resignation, and every form labored manfully onward. For Neil there was something pitiful in the sight. And, as usual, the dogged spirit of the fugitives inspired him to similar effort.

"Neil!" It was his mother's voice calling him sharply.

He turned back into the drawing-room, and met her there. She had two satchels, and he sprang forward to carry them for her. She repulsed him.

"So," said his mother sternly, "you were married to your low-born beauty yesterday! At one stroke you severed the ties that bound you to your family! Answer, and tell me whether I speak the truth. I hope I have been deceived, yet I have a conviction to the contrary."

Neil was astounded by his mother's words. Where had she learned of his marriage? He started with a wild hope. Had she, by some wonderful play of chance, met Beryl? And had Beryl told her?

"Mother, have you seen my wife? Where is she? Oh, tell me where!"

She parried his eagerness with merciless eyes. A sigh of bitter disappointment burst from her lips.

"Then it is true," she said mechanically. "What a blow, what a grievous blow! Do you realize what you have done?" she cried. "You have made yourself a social outcast! Eunice Bartholdt, with her prestige, her millions, her love for you which only awaited the asking of her hand, would cut you dead on the street. You have broken my heart, Neil; your waywardness has broken my heart!"

She caught blindly at the satchels, and his heart smote him. Not because he had obeyed the dictates of his heart and wedded the girl he loved, but because of his mother's mistaken ideas and the sorrow they were causing her.

"Mother, mother," he exclaimed, "only to know my dearest Beryl is to love her! She is so good, so beautiful, so true, that she would win you from your false notions of pride and blood. Besides, her family is as good as our own——"

"No more!" interrupted Mrs. Preston. "I forbid you singing her praises to me. The girl laid her plans well and won you in spite of us. You have made your choice and must abide by it. But not a penny of your father's fortune shall ever come to you. You were not brought up to be a working man," she added, with curling lip, "and love in a cottage will not turn out as you fondly imagine. When your bride"—the word came with bitter emphasis—"finds you are penniless, she will not long remain to share your lot."

Neil's spirit quivered under the lash of his mother's tongue. His manhood asserted itself, and he drew his tall form erect.

"I have married the woman I love," he answered, "the only woman I ever could love. I was reared a gentleman; I trust I can still keep the title, even though I am cut off from my patrimony and compelled to work. Honest toil is not degrading."

"I will have none of your heroics. Arthur is in front with his automobile, to carry me out of the city. Are you disposed to accompany us?"

"I cannot leave until I have found my wife! Will you not tell me where you saw her, where I can find her?"

"She called at this house last evening, and asked for news of you."

"Before—before I came, mother?" asked Neil hoarsely.

"After you came. You were asleep when I talked with her and sent her away."

"Asleep!" echoed Neil blankly. "I was under the same roof with her, and—and—— Oh, merciful heavens, this is too much! Why did you not call me?" he harshly demanded. "If you were too heartless, why did not Arthur arouse me and tell me my darling was here?"

"Call me heartless, what you will," answered the mother bitterly. "I am glad to think I have not done the least thing to help on your mad infatuation for this pretty working girl—this penniless toiler who has dared to come between you and me."

"What did you tell her?" he asked, a threat in his voice and eyes. "It cannot be that pride has turned your heart to stone? Surely you did not send her away without one little word of hope?"

"She got no word of hope from me, the insolent creature! I told her——"

"Mother! You are speaking about my wife, and I will not listen to the terms you use, for they are cruel and unjust. You are deliberately wounding me!"

Anger rose fiercely into the proud face.

"And have you not wounded me, young man?" the mother sharply demanded. "You have made your own bed, and must lie in it. Go, and never let me see your face again!"

Those awful words struck him to the soul.

"You—you cannot mean that!" he finally whispered.

"I mean every word of it! I thank Providence that I have still your brother Morley to lean upon in my declining years. Go with your working-girl wife; and when your friends turn from you with contempt, and the doors of the best society are closed in your face, remember that you have only yourself to blame! Leave me! I have suffered enough!"

A half hysterical laugh accompanied the words. Neil knew his mother was not herself, yet he did not linger. Turning slowly, he left the room and the house.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MISS V. F., Mandan, N. D.—Apply an ointment of aloes to the finger nails. This is very bitter, and will prevent you from biting your nails, in consequence of the taste. You might also try five-grain doses of bromide of soda morning and night, to counteract your nervous tendency.

MRS. M. J., Axtel, Ky.—COMFORT does not publish sure cures for anything, especially a sure cure for epilepsy. As stated in COMFORT, this disease is incurable.

MRS. W. E. C., West Columbia, Texas.—For reducing your flesh, exercise moderately, and on alternate days drink one quart of skimmed milk in divided doses—one glass in the morning, one at noon, one at four o'clock and the last glass at night. Of course, at all times avoid sweets, potatoes, etc., and eat such vegetables as spinach, lettuce, celery. Drink plenty of good water.

MISS M. T., Oregon, Ill.—You have answered your question in your letter. You mean neurosis. This is inflammation of the nerves. Possibly your trouble is of malarial origin; if so, you should take some quinine pills three times a day. Also rub the inflamed parts with some stimulating liniment—such as the official "army liniment," so-called.

MRS. J. D. S., Greenboro, N. C.—You probably have muscular rheumatism. Try ironing the back with a hot flatiron. First wring out three or four thicknesses of flannel in mustard water, apply the flannel to the back and then have some one apply the iron until the back is well steamed. You may have myocarditis and this would cause your heart attacks. For the whitish discharge, try a teaspoonful of table salt to the quart of water as a douche.

MRS. V. E. J., Kingman, Arizona.—The lumps on the back of your husband's neck are no doubt enlargement of the lymphatic glands. He probably has been eating too much red meat. A meat free diet, including eggs, will help him. He should also paint the "lumps" every other day with tincture of iodine. Internally, he should use five drops of a saturated solution of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals.

MRS. L. A. D., Falkville, Ala.—Maybe the irregularity of your daughter, as to her periods, is due to anemia; if so, Basham's mixture is indicated, in tablespoonful doses after meals, well diluted. In case she has malaria, which frequently causes irregularity, use two-grain quinine pills, three times a day, after meals. In any case, treat the cause, and omit a local examination, at least until you have tried the above remedies.

MRS. W. B. C., Floydale, Texas.—You can get the ovarian tablets at any good wholesale druggist. Have your family doctor write to some good wholesale druggist and get them for you.

MRS. W. S. V., Pioneer, La.—Your sty, which is not a sty but a chalazion, must be removed by operation. This is the only cure for you. You should have your eyes examined for eyeglasses at the same time.

MRS. T. D. S., San Antonio, Texas.—There is no simple remedy for "bed-wetting." It is one of the most persistent and difficult troubles to handle known to the medical profession. Petuitrin extract is the last and best suggestion along this line. This remedy can only be used on the advice of your local doctor.

Comfort's League of Cousins

He is in much the same condition that the son of parents who have placed unreasonable hardships on him and restrictions round him and by so doing have bred in him a spirit of revenge which shows itself as soon as he is of age and realizes he is free. He demonstrates his freedom by raising a little hell but in time he sees the folly of it and cools down and becomes a good citizen. That is about the condition of the laboring world. What is needed from you is advice and council to assist in sobering him up and bringing him back to a sense of his responsibility and a normal state of mind and not opposition and harsh criticism.

W. S. HURST.

Bill, yours is a delightful letter and shows the spirit of a real man, but, alas, you have not got the right viewpoint regarding the situation on which you write. The young laboring giant you speak of (and I am part of him and belong to his class, and for my part work twice as hard and twice as long as he ever does or ever will do) is not open to advice from any quarter except that of the red-eyed radical. His parents restricted him, as wise parents should restrict their children because they know the evil passions that are in them, and he is drunk, not with freedom but with license. He is intoxicated with the vision of a world which he will dominate, a workless world, where crops, bridges railroads, locomotives, yachts and automobiles (especially the automobiles for he will have a string of them tied round his neck, and a dozen or two in each pocket) will all spring into existence by just wishing for them or by issuing an order which will be handed to a commissioner, who in turn will hand it to a clerk who will politely pass it on to the office boy, who will present it to the office cat, who will drop it into the waste-basket and make a sofa pillow of it. Oh, it's a great life if you don't weaken, a great dream if you don't wake up. As for advice! Ye gods, I have handed it out by the bushel and I have been rewarded with insults for my pains. I told you years ago if labor acted sanely and sensibly, after its mighty arm had won this war, that it could get almost anything it wanted, within reason, then I was spat on and accused of being in the pay of Morgan and Rockefeller. Our social fabric is a complex and delicate thing, and it must be still fresh in your mind that I implored labor to heed the sign visible on all old bridges to "Walk your horses!" But the radical element (and it is always the radical hotheads who get control and lead the more conservative men of your type round by the nose) insist on galloping over the bridge, smashing it to pieces, and letting the whole fabric of society plunge into the abyss below. Your young man, unfortunately, does not want to sober up, he wants to stay wild, and, what is more, instead of appreciating the care his parents have taken of him, he is waiting a chance to beat them up. Today we do not want any top dogs or underdogs, we do not want to be bitten from below or hammered from above. A new spirit had come into the world, and it was a good, brotherly spirit. It was the spirit of live and let live, of give and take, and take and give. To a sane, sensible, reasonable, loyal and honest man, can be granted anything within reason, and I fondly hoped our young laboring giant was the type of man who visualized this fact. But, alas, he got into bad company, began drinking wood alcohol and lost his vision. He refused the advice of his conservative leaders. He realized his strength and started out to demonstrate the driving power of his new six-cylinder engine, without knowing how to use it, and he was determined to use it if he brought all creation down into the abyss on top of him. The result was that those who by superior intelligence and initiative controlled a business, big or small, were afraid to go ahead in their enterprises. There was much they wanted to do but when they gazed at the young giant and saw he was ugly, vicious and drunk with power, and that behind him were a gang of clever, red-eyed, scheming rascals urging him to deeds of violence, both Mr. Mild-eyed employer and Mr. Hard-boiled employer got scared. They saw that the man who had saved them now wanted to destroy them, so they just closed their office doors and phoned for the police, and that is just about all any man or set of men can do when they are dealing with a case of wood alcohol jag. Now if the young giant would really sober up and stay sober, produce instead of loaf, win back the confidence of those who do want to help him, purge his body and mind of the poison that has been injected into it by the glib-tongued agitators who would exploit him a thousand times more than he has ever been exploited in the past, then we'll jog along the middle course that will bring peace, prosperity and happiness to all. Your picture of the young man looking for revenge is about the worst possible picture any man could draw, and should you bring that picture near me I'd put my foot through it. You cannot build a safe and sane world while dominated by a spirit of ugliness, envy and revenge.

P. S. Please don't use government stationery for private correspondence; it is an injustice to the public who have to pay for it, and demonstrates the danger we face when handing over the control of public utilities to irresponsible people, who regard everything that belongs to the government as their personal property.

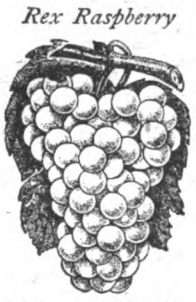
Plant This Grand Fruit Orchard

Delaware Grape

Bartlett Pear



Concord Grape

Wealthy Apple

Rex Raspberry

Niagara Grape

For A Club Of Two

We Will Send You Seventeen Apple And Pear Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines!

BY special arrangement with the growers in Michigan we can now offer our readers this grand Fruit and Orchard Collection of 17 Choice Fruit Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines. If planted at standard distances apart they will nicely fill an eighth of an acre. Or they can be planted closer if desired, or they can be made to form a border around your yard or lot. Wherever grown, however, they will yield loads of the finest Apples, Pears, Grapes, Raspberries and Dewberries every year as long as you live. All the varieties in this splendid Collection have been carefully selected for their characteristics of rapid growth, early maturity, immense yield and extreme hardiness. We believe it would be difficult to secure as much actual value from any other assortment of the same size.

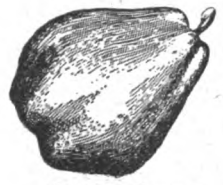
Here is what we give you:

One Snow Apple Tree, One Wealthy Apple Tree, One Kieffer Pear Tree, One Bartlett Pear Tree, Two Lucretia Dewberry Bushes, Two Rex Raspberry Bushes, Three Niagara Grape Vines, Three Delaware Grape Vines, Three Concord Grape Vines.

The four grafted Apple and Pear Trees in this Collection are the best that can be procured. They are one foot high, grafted by experts from bearing trees with high records. They will take root as soon as planted and grow rapidly into vigorous healthy trees. You could not get better trees at any price.

The nine Grape Vines are a product of southern Michigan, where the finest grapes in the world are grown. From selected vines, cuttings are taken and buried in underground pits until they undergo a process known as "callousing." After being properly "calloused" the cuttings will take root as soon as planted. The "calloused" Grape Cuttings in this Collection are all produced in this manner. They will grow rapidly and bear immense crops of choice grapes even sooner than large vines planted at the same time.

The two Raspberry Bushes and two Dewberry Bushes in this Collection are robust, one-year-old youngsters, ready to set out as soon as you receive them. They will begin growing at once and develop into fine, heavy-bearing bushes if given proper attention.



All Will Bear Soon! The garden which you plant with this fine Fruit and Orchard Collection will prove an ever increasing source of pleasure and profit to you year after year. All the trees, vines and bushes will bear fruit in a remarkably short time. The Raspberry will produce some fruit this season. Then next year your Dewberries will commence bearing. The following year you will have grapes and some pears. (A properly cared-for Grape Vine will yield a bushel of grapes every season.) Your Apple and Pear Trees will begin bearing in from three to five years. Then you will have loads and loads of fine fruit in increasing quantity every year.

Guaranteed To Grow! Everything in this Collection is absolutely guaranteed to grow. We stand behind every Collection sent out and the growers in turn stand behind us. You may rest assured that if you order this splendid Collection (and you surely ought to), it will reach you in good condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. If any of the trees, bushes or vines fail to make growth satisfactory to you, we hereby guarantee to replace them promptly and absolutely without charge to you. You cannot lose. You run absolutely no risk in accepting this offer.

Full Planting Instructions! With this fine Fruit and Orchard Collection we are also going to send you complete instructions for planting. These directions are fully illustrated with pictures and diagrams showing you just what to do and when and how to do it. By following these simple directions you will in a few years have one of the finest orchards in your neighborhood.

Our Free Offer! Send us only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 50 cents each and this remarkable Fruit and Orchard Collection is yours free—The two Apple Trees, two Pear Trees, two Dewberry Bushes, two Raspberry Bushes and nine Grape Vines. The whole Collection will be carefully packed in moss, securely wrapped and sent to you by prepaid parcel post, direct from the Michigan growers at the proper time for planting in your locality. Remember we guarantee that everything will reach you in perfect condition. Profit in Keeping Bees comb. It was built on a full sheet of foundation. The frame was wired with four horizontal wires; each was firmly embedded in the foundation. Observe that the comb is built out to the wood all around and that there is no drone comb. All cells are of the worker size. Try to get all combs like this one. Full sheets are better also in sections. However, those who buy supers nailed up and painted and fitted with sections, will have to be satisfied with starters, as full sheets in sections do not ship well.

And now about the problem of making a success, making the bees pay. It can be summed up in a few words. Keep all colonies strong all the time. This involves a good many problems which will have to be dealt with separately. If you can keep colonies strong in the summer, that is, have strong colonies for the honey flow. If you can keep colonies strong in the summer, that is, prevent them from splitting up into swarms, you will get a good crop. If you go through the summer and fall with strong colonies you will carry your bees into the winter months in good condition; and if you carry them through the winter, still strong, they will be ready to build up rapidly for the honey flow again. Keep this idea fixed in your mind at all times and it will assist, immensely, in making a success.

"How much can I make out of a colony of bees?" This is a hard question to answer. Locations differ, seasons differ, and beekeepers differ. Four or five miles sometimes makes all the difference between a good and a bad location. Seasons vary all the way from scanty to copious honey flows; and every one acquainted with the facts knows that one beekeeper may make a success in a poor location while another will make a failure in a good location. In a general way it may be said that a colony of bees should give a return of $10.

"Is there very much labor connected with beekeeping?" When the number of colonies is small—half a dozen or so—there is no labor. It is simply a pastime, if one is a real beekeeper. But if the number of colonies runs up to 150 or 200, there is a good deal of work. And yet a knowledge of the business enables one to eliminate a large amount of work. Thus, in my own case, from ten to fifteen trips, remaining from one-half day to two days, are all that are necessary for the care of an out-apiary for an entire year. The variation is determined by the peculiarity of the season. In June and July, trips are made every ten days. This is the busiest time of the year.

Remedies

ECZEMA.—Boil one cup of sassafras bark and one quart of hot water twenty minutes; drain. To one half cup of the tea add one tablespoon of pure lard and let simmer on back of stove until water is evaporated. Then put in cold cream jar. Wash affected parts three or four times a day and let it dry, then apply the salve.—MRS. MARY K., Kansas.

INGROWING NAILS.—Nearly thirty years ago I worked as general utility man in a small hotel. Part of my work was to keep things clean. One time while scrubbing the kitchen floor with hot and strong lye water I went at it barefooted and the next day I discovered that all the nails on my feet were bent up and I've never been troubled with ingrowing nails since.—F. W. K., Texas.

COLD.—To loosen cold in throat or lungs, beat one egg in a coffee cup and fill cup with boiling milk and drink as hot as possible.—MRS. H. F. R., Hutchinson, Minn.

GOITRE.—Make a sack from flour sack muslin, fill with table salt, dampen one side and put damp side to goitre, every night until cured. Tie a dry cloth over damp pack. No change will be noticed if goitre is large for three months, then on measuring after that a change will be noticed with little tissue paper like wrinkles over the growth. Keep on and the change will be more rapid from then. Don't discontinue the treatment for one year for large goitres, even though the neck has become normal as it may start to grow again. I made my sacks a dozen at a time, as they become very hard and uncomfortable. As the salt would get into a pile in one end I quilted lines across the sack and filled each space with salt. This keeps the salt evenly distributed over the neck. Rub a little vaseline on throat if it gets rough. This will relieve the choking sensation very soon.—COMFORT SISTER, Portland, Oregon.

How Signs Of Old Age Creep Into Your System When The Iron In Your Blood Runs Low

For Want of Iron, You May Be Old At Thirty—Nervous, Irritable and All Run-Down While at Fifty or Sixty, With Plenty of Iron in Your Blood, You May Be Young in Feeling and Brimming Over With Vim and Energy

IRON IS THE RED BLOOD FOOD

That Helps Strengthen the Nerves, Restores Wasted Tissue and Aids in Giving Renewed Force and Power to the Body. Physicians Explain Why Administration of Simple Nuxated Iron Often Increases the Strength and Endurance of Delicate, Run-down People in Two Weeks' Time.

Old age has already sunk its talons into thousands of men and women who ought still to be enjoying the springtime and summer of life simply because they have allowed worry, overwork, nervous strain, dissipation and occupational poison to sap the iron from their blood and thereby destroy its power to change food into living tissue, muscle and brain. You will find plenty of people at 40 who are broken in health and steadily going downward to physical and mental decay while others at 50 are strong, active, alert and seemingly growing younger every year. One class withers and dies like leaves in autumn while the other by keeping up a strong power of resistance against disease may pass the three score and ten mark with surprising health, strength and vigor. But you cannot expect to look and feel young and vigorous unless you have plenty of iron in your blood, and physicians explain below why they prescribe organic iron—Nuxated Iron—to supply the iron deficiency in the weak, nervous, and run-down so as to build them up into stronger, healthier men and women.

"Many a man and woman who ought still to be young in feeling is losing the old time vim and energy that makes life worth living simply because their blood is starving for want of iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "Thousands are ageing and breaking down at a time when they should be enjoying perfect health because anaemia—lack of iron in the blood—has fastened its grip on them and is sapping their strength, vitality and energy. But in my opinino you can't make strong, keen, forceful men and healthy rosy-cheeked women by feeding them on metallic iron. The old forms of metallic iron must go through a digestive process to transform them into organic iron—Nuxated Iron—before they are ready to be taken up and assimilated by the human system. I strongly advise readers in all cases to get a physician's prescription for organic iron—Nuxated Iron—or if you don't want to go to this trouble then purchase Nuxated Iron in its original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the package. If you have taken preparations such as Nux and Iron and other similar iron products and failed to get results, remember that such products are an entirely different thing from Nuxated Iron."

YOU ARE AGEING
If you are wearied by the activities of your daily life

YOU ARE AGEING
If you have lost the spring of your step and your movements are cumbrous

YOU ARE AGEING
If your skin is shrinking and your face looks wrinkled, careworn and old

YOU ARE AGEING
If the enthusiasm for tackling your daily problems has waned

Dr. George H. Baker, formerly Physician and Surgeon, Monmouth Memorial Hospital of New Jersey, says: "From a careful examination of the formula and my own tests of Nuxated Iron, I feel convinced that it is a preparation which any physician can take himself or prescribe for his patients with the utmost confidence of obtaining highly beneficial and satisfactory results."

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE. Nuxated Iron which has been used by Dr. Sullivan and other physicians with such surprising results, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Preventing Harness Sores

WERE owners more careful to have collars and other parts of the harness fit properly and then keep them clean, smooth and dry, collar galls and other sores would be comparatively rare. Better buy and fit properly a new collar for a new bought or broken-in horse or colt than try to fit the old, worn, rough collar that has been "handed down for generations." The harnessmaker is best able to fit a collar. He will advise wetting the leather with hot water to soften it before placing the collar upon the neck and then to mould it perfectly to the neck and shoulders. Some simply put on a wet collar and let it dry in place, but that is not sufficient. Moulding the collar to place is necessary. To toughen the shoulders for spring and summer work it is well to bathe them two or three times daily with cold, soft water containing half an ounce of tannic or gallic acid to the gallon; or a tablespoonful of powdered alum to the quart. A strong tea of white oak bark is popular for this purpose with many practical farmers. During the days of hard, hot work in the fields, bathe the shoulders, neck and other parts irritated by the harness, with soft cold water containing a heaping teaspoonful of table salt to the quart. Raise the collar and allow air to play between it and the skin every time the horse stops when at work. Remove the harness at noon, unless that is absolutely impossible. Cleanse the collar and set it in the sun to dry at the noon hour. Keep it smooth. Hair, dandruff and sweat collecting upon the bearing surface of the collar cause sores. If the shoulders are a bit sore, dust the inner surface of the collar with talcum powder before use. Do not clip hair from the neck where the collar rides if the skin is seen to be sore. Have the collar properly adjusted with the hame strap and if necessary use a new, smooth collar pad of leather or zinc. To sore necks apply twice daily a lotion composed of two ounces of tincture of iodin and six ounces of extract of witch-hazel. Use this on all lumps caused by harness. A good gall ointment is made by mixing together one dram each of iodoform, tannic acid and boric acid to the ounce of lard. If iodoform is objectionable on account of smell, substitute calomel or subnitrate of bismuth. "White lotion" composed of one ounce of sugar of lead and six drams of sulphate of zinc in a pint of soft water is most popular for surface sores and wounds. Label the bottle "poison" and shake it well before use. This lotion also is excellent for barb wire wounds that do not cut deeply. If a large, hard, round, sore lump forms on the shoulder under the collar, a deep-seated abscess is present and the pus will have to be liberated by a veterinarian. External treatment will not suffice. A dead, horny "island" of skin usually is present in a chronic sore where the collar rides. It is termed a "sit-fast" and must be cut out before healing can take place. Afterward use white lotion two or three times a day.

BOTS.—Please inform me the best treatment for bots in a horse's stomach. W. L.

A.—Bots are present in the stomach of practically every horse that has grazed during the previous grass season and seldom if ever cause noticeable ill effects. In a few instances they may cause ill-thrift and when passing out of the body in spring and early summer they sometimes hook onto the lining of the rectum and cause irritation. Prevention is of most importance and consists in removing the nits from the long hairs of the legs and breast by singeing, clipping or wetting with a five per cent solution of coal tar dip as often as seems to be necessary. A veterinarian may be employed to administer capsules containing bisulphid of carbon, if bots are known to be doing harm.

INJURED STIFLE.—My colt, one year old, slipped down and hurt one of his hind legs in the joint. After the lameness and swelling was gone, it left an enlargement just above the joint. What can I do to reduce it? J. E. B.

A.—We should advise you to treat this condition with a proprietary reducing lotion which you can buy at a drug store; or rub in 10 per cent iodin vasogen or petrogen twice daily.

SWINE PLAGUE.—Please tell me what is the matter with my hogs. They began to cough and some would vomit green frothy foam. In about three days they began to thump and later die. Upon examination I found that the lungs were completely decayed. MRS. J. V. W.

A.—Your hogs have died of swine plague (hemorrhagic septicemia) and this might have been prevented, with a fair degree of success, by vaccination. You should have a veterinarian show you how to cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the houses and pens. Then he should vaccinate any new hogs you put in those quarters. It would be better still to provide new quarters on new ground.

POINTING OF FEET.—What ails my mare? She sets out her front feet and stretches back as if something hurt her, otherwise she seems all right. I feed her hay and oats when she is working. D. K.

A.—Such "pointing" of both fore feet usually is a symptom of founder, in which disease the horse is excessively lame and is liable to remain so. The hind feet are advanced under the body in founder. If the mare is not lame and does not advance her hind feet under her body when the fore feet are advanced, she probably stretches on account of constipation or irritation of the kidneys from indigestion. Allow her a roomy box-stall, work her or give her exercise every day and keep her bowels active.

Six Wheel Chairs in March

549 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Our March distribution of wheel chairs makes a gain of one over the February distribution. That is good work, considering the adverse weather conditions. Let us all pull together and try to boost the April wheel chairs up another notch to seven for the month.

The six March chairs go to Thomas Henry Williams, Rear 738 S. Main St., Akron, Ohio, 139; Harold Stewart, 840 Madison Ave., Kansas City, Mo., 138; Dewey Beldon Adams, R. R. 3, Springfield, Tenn., 92; Clifford Brown, Avant, Okla., 81; John Bailey, Duffau, Texas, 81: Ray White, Milam, Texas, 78.

The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Thomas Henry Williams, age three years and nine months, had infantile paralysis when sixteen months old, which left him crippled in both legs.

Harold Stewart, age 10, was crippled in both legs by an injury to spine and hip three years ago caused by rough treatment by another boy.

Dewey Beldon Adams, age 21, has been almost totally helpless the past eight years, caused by epilepsy. His mother writes that she is very desirous of obtaining the wheel chair to cheer him up, as he is so helpless that he can not get about the house and never able to go out of doors. Also it will be a great help to her in caring for him.

Clifford Brown, age 10, a helpless cripple from birth, so helpless that he has to be waited on like an infant. He is getting heavy to be carried about, and the wheel chair will be a help in caring for him.

John Bailey, age 4, is a brave little sufferer from tuberculosis of the hip with which he has been afflicted the past two years and by which he has become permanently crippled.

Ray White, age 12, another entirely helpless little cripple who is much in need of a wheel chair.

This is an aggregation of especially pitiful cases, mostly those of children whose young lives have been blighted at such an early age that they have never known the common joys of childhood.

On our waiting list are many whose condition and need are equally distressing. Lend a helping hand to provide some of them with much needed wheel chairs.

You will be interested in the Roll of Honor. Try to get your name in our own Roll of Honor next month.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions, or a dollar or more in money, to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

This wonderful device is a triumph of scientific and mechanical genius, the outcome of more than 30 years experience and the results accomplished by its use are little short of miraculous.

Many hundreds of physicians and surgeons recommend the Brooks Appliance and condemn makeshift trusses as more harmful and dangerous than any other method of retaining and treating rupture. Thousands of people have written us testifying to the amazing results they have secured from this great invention. Many of these people live right in your vicinity and we will be glad to send you copies of their thankful letters if you will ask for them when you write.

Men, Women and Children Find the Brooks Appliance Equally Effective.

No other rupture support, truss, lock, device, pad or plaster is offered to the public under so broad a guarantee of satisfaction.

If for any reason whatever you do not wish to keep the Brooks Appliance after you try it, send it back. You don't have to give any reason. You are to be the sole judge. There will be no argument, no dispute or misunderstanding.

Railroad Men Demand a Billion Dollars Wage Increase Which, if Granted, Will Add that Much to the Cost of Living

EVERY man, woman and child in the United States has a personal interest in the pending demand of the railroad men for an increase of wages because, if allowed, it will amount practically to a national tax, that no one can escape, averaging ten dollars a head per year, fifty dollars on a family of five. On March 22 the trainmen and other workers in the employ of all the railroads in the country, numbering one million eight hundred and fifty thousand men, demanded additional wage increases averaging five hundred and ninety dollars more pay per man and totaling one billion one hundred million dollars yearly wage increase. Such an enormous sum is almost beyond human comprehension and only by comparison can its significance be grasped. It is as much as the entire national debt was at the time we entered the World War. It is a big billion dollars and a hundred millions more; and bear in mind that a billion is a thousand millions.

The railroad men are entitled to and should, of course, be paid a fair wage but no more, because any excess above just compensation would impose a gross injustice on the entire population which has to pay it. Understand that the large increase now demanded is additional to the various wage increases given the railroad men during and since the war and in recent years previous thereto. Whether the railroad employees are justly entitled to the increase they demand or to any wage increase at this time are questions that concern the public interests far more than they do the owners of the railroads, and therefore the representatives of the people should have an authoritative voice in the decision, and the pressure of public opinion should be exerted in favor of this course. Let us examine some of the important facts bearing on this proposition.

During the war the Government took over the railroads, cut down the service and burdened the country with much higher passenger and freight rates. Nevertheless in the little more than two years of Government management it operated the railroads and express at a loss of nine hundred million dollars which had to be made good out of the United States treasury, or in other words out of the pockets of the people who in the end have to pay this loss as well as the higher passenger and freight rates. As it happens this operating loss approximates the wage increases given the railroad employees under Government management. Besides this operating loss the Government has been obliged to assist the railroads in the way of loans for equipment and advances for other necessary purposes to a still larger amount, so that, as appears by the report made to Congress April 5, 1920, by Walker D. Hines, U. S. Director General of Railroads, the Government has already appropriated out of the national treasury the sum of one billion four hundred and fifty millions for the support and expenditures of the Railroad Administration, and Mr. Hines now asks for a further appropriation of four hundred and twenty millions which he estimates to be "required to enable the Railroad Administration to fund certain indebtedness in accordance with the Transportation Act and to defray cost of Federal control," making a grand total of one billion eight hundred and seventy million dollars that the Government has been called upon to provide for the purpose of meeting the expenses and obligations incurred by its Railroad Administration.

The railroads as a whole were in sorry plight when, on the first day of last March, the Government returned them to the corporations that owned them. Many of them lacked adequate equipment, and notwithstanding the largely increased passenger and freight rates very few were earning enough to pay their fixed charges and running expenses, the latter having grown enormously under Government management. It was conceded at that time that when Government aid ends, as it will on the last day of August, a further increase of transportation rates will be necessary to save the majority of the roads from bankruptcy. It is evident from this state of affairs that any wage increase allowed the railroad men will have to be passed on to the public in the form of a corresponding increase of freight rates. And it was for this reason that the railroad managers on conferring with the representatives of the railroad employees refused to grant the large wage increase recently demanded or any considerable increase except with the approval of arbitrators to be appointed by the President to represent and safeguard the rights and interests of the public as authorized by the Act of Congress which provided for the return of the railroads to their owners. Thus the matter has been passed up to President Wilson who, at the present writing, has not acted on the request to appoint the arbitrators to serve in behalf of the public.

High freight rates are an important factor in raising the cost of living. High freight rates, like middlemen's profits, raise the price the consumer has to pay and in many cases lower the price the producer receives. Don't think that freight rates do not concern you merely because you have no direct dealings with the railroad. You pay freight every time you buy anything at the store, because the price of every article of commerce includes at least one, and more often than otherwise two, three or more freights depending on the journeys the raw material had made to the factory and the finished product had made from factory to wholesaler and thence to the retailer. Freight may even double the price of an article. The writer saw a railroad freight bill in which the charge for transportation of a carload of watermelons exceeded the sum received by the producer of the fruit. As a rule the consumer pays the freight; but when the freight raises the price to a prohibitive figure the producer has to pay the freight, or the expense may be divided between producer and consumer depending on competitive market conditions. Farmers know full well that the prices they receive for produce they ship to distant markets in competition with nearby producers is reduced by the amount of the freight charge. The freight charge is a tax that can't be dodged and everybody has to pay. Freight rates so largely affect the prosperity of the entire country and so intimately concern every person that any proposition that involves a great increase in the cost of transportation should receive the most careful consideration by those in authority.

Senate Finally Rejects the League of Nations Proposition

ON March 19 the question of the acceptance of the proposed peace treaty again came to a vote in the U. S. Senate and again met the same fate as when voted on and defeated last November. Both times the stumbling block was the League of Nations part of the treaty, and both times its defeat was due to the determined opposition of a stubborn minority. The action on the latter occasion amounts to a final rejection of the League of Nations proposition, as the Senate then voted to return the treaty to the President with a notification that it had "refused to advise and consent to its ratification."

The people should feel a deep sense of relief in the assurance that our country has thus escaped the manifest dangers to our national independence, peace and welfare that lurked in the League of Nations program as written in the peace treaty. Our February editorial described a few of the worst of these dangers and explained how the majority of the senators proposed to make the acceptance of the treaty subject to and conditioned on certain reservations designed to safeguard the rights and interests of the United States, and to prevent the League of Nations from being used as a means of foreign interference in our domestic affairs or of drawing us into European wars, or as a pretext for Europe to meddle with any American nation in violation of our time-honored Monroe Doctrine. This was the compromising attitude of the 49 senators who, though many of them had little faith in the League of Nations, were willing to accept it with these safeguards rather than sacrifice the entire peace treaty in order to get rid of the League. They constituted a majority of the Senate but were short, by a few votes, of the two-thirds majority necessary to ratify the treaty.

And so the entire peace treaty was eventually rejected through the opposition of a minority of 35, consisting of a strange combination of 20 senators of un-American ideals, who voted against it because they wanted the European-made League of Nations without any Americanizing reservations, and 15 senators so intensely American that they would not stand for tying the United States up in a foreign league under any conditions. The action of these two discordant elements, though actuated by directly opposite motives, chanced to run in the same direction and proved effective in accomplishing the purpose of the 15 "Irreconcilables," as they were called.

The League of Nations scheme should not have been inserted in the peace treaty, but ought to have been submitted as a separate and distinct proposition to be considered and determined after the peace treaty and on its own merits, as the result has shown. Had they been separated the peace treaty could have been presented much earlier and would have been accepted promptly and gotten out of the way a year ago. But there is reason to suspect that the promoters of the League project purposely linked it up with the peace treaty in the hope that the embarrassment that the Senate would meet in not being able to refuse the one without rejecting the other would prove effective in overcoming the opposition to the League. The result is different from what was probably anticipated, but we are subjected to embarrassment in having had to reject the peace treaty to keep out of the League. However, this difficulty will soon be remedied, though in a somewhat awkward and unusual manner, by the adoption by Congress of a joint resolution declaring the war ended provided Germany accepts our offer of peace on the terms specified in the rejected peace treaty.

Allies Disagree—Europe a Seething Cauldron of Enmity and Strife

THE World War seems to have settled nothing. In spite of the peace treaty, signed months ago by all the belligerants except the United States, Europe remains an armed camp; armed conflicts are in progress in spots; civil war is rampant or imminent throughout that continent and in Asia; Turkey, in defiance of the Great Powers, persists in carrying out its barbarous policy of exterminating its Christian inhabitants; Germany has recently broken the peace treaty by sending an army into the neutral zone to suppress a Bolshevic insurrection and France has retaliated by military occupation of the German city of Frankfort in the neutral zone at the risk of precipitating a renewal of the World War; discord has arisen between Great Britain, France and Italy, and a general feeling of insecurity, jealousy and mutual distrust pervades the governments and peoples of the old world.

The League of Nations, which we were urged to join as a sure means of keeping peace throughout the world, was organized over there some months ago. But what does it amount to when the principal members of the League disagree? When put to the test of a serious strain the League covenant amounts to a "mere scrap of paper." Fortunately for us, by not joining the League we are under no obligations to mix in this or any future European imbroglio. They want to draw us into their mess, but we shall do well to keep out and let Europe stew in her own juice until she has had enough of bickering and fighting and comes to her senses.

HOME PRESERVING OF FISH

FISH CAKES WITH PARSNIP BALLS.

WELCOME SPRING TONICS

DANDELION, RHUBARB, ASPARAGUS

FISH is invaluable as an article of food because of its comparative cheapness, its abundance and its wholesomeness. Americans are notoriously deficient as fish eaters and we would do well to follow the example of our foreign-born neighbors who are expert in fish cookery. One reason why fish is not so popular here as abroad is that we do not properly season and cook it. Rolled, and fried until all the juices are dried out, is far too common a method of cooking fish.

Generally speaking, fish is better when plainly cooked, and this includes baking, steaming, boiling and broiling. Chowders and soups made from fish combined with other materials make excellent one-dish meals. Plenty of seasoning in the form of sauces, stuffing, or seasoning the water in which the fish is boiled, will create a new interest in fish eating.

The canning of fish has been more extensively entered into the past year than ever before, and now that the lakes and streams are open, a new source of food is given us which, in the season of plenty, should be preserved for future use just as we do our meat and vegetables. Canning and salting are two easy methods available to housewives.

MARSHMALLOW.

In using commercially canned fish, it will be found that the organic matter in the bones is dissolved, leaving only a soft mineral that can be eaten. With the small bones thus softened, the fish is much more acceptable as food. The large bones and vertebræ are easily removed, and if this is not done it is not necessary to continue "processing" until they are "soft." The steam pressure cooker process for canning fish is to be recommended as it makes rapid handling to prevent spoilage possible. A community outfit for canning will reduce the cost and labor on the principle that "many hands make the work easy."

Canning Fish

When using coarse-scaled, thick-skinned fishes, cut off the fins or make an incision on each side of the fin and pull it out. Make an incision through the skin along the back, another along the belly, and connect these two by a third encircling the body just behind the head, press the head onto a sharpened nail driven through a plank so that it may be firmly held, and take hold of the skin at the angle of the two incisions at the back of the head and remove it by pulling toward the tail. Thin-skinned fishes should be scaled, not skinned. Cut off the head, remove the intestines and other organs, and take out the backbone by making a cut with a sharp knife on each side, inside the body cavity. Wash thoroughly, taking particular care to remove the blood along the back.

Cut the fish into strips to fit the length of the jars to be used and rub with dry salt, using a level tablespoon to each pint jar of fish. Fill the jars with the pieces packed as tightly as possible, put on the rubber rings, and place the caps on the jars loosely, so that the steam can escape; that is, a screw-topped jar should not be tightly turned down, nor the second wire of the wire-topped type snapped into place. Put no water in the jars. Cook in a pressure cooker for one and one half hours after steam pressure registers 15 pounds or the temperature 250 degrees. Tighten the tops and cool.

DATE MUFFINS.

Salting Fish

Large fish having soft fins, small scales, and thin skin, should be scaled but not skinned. Remove the head, split down the belly to the vent, and clean. Make a cut on each side of the backbone inside of the body cavity, cut the bone in two as far back as it can be reached and remove the cut-off portion, then with the knife follow along the backbone to one side and remove it with the tail. Cut the fish to fit container so that the pieces will lie flat. It is not necessary to remove the backbone of small fish. They are split the entire length, and the bellies washed out clean. After the fish are cleaned, wash in salted water and be sure that all particles of blood are removed.

To salt, place a layer of coarse salt on the bottom of the container; a tight barrel, keg or earthen crock. On the salt put a layer of fish, one deep, and sprinkle with salt. Continue the order of salt and fish until container is filled. In about eight or nine days the salt will have sufficiently dissolved to make a strong brine and the fish should be taken out, washed and repacked in the container and covered with a freshly-made brine, strong enough to float an egg. In seven days drain off this brine and cover with a fresh one made with a little more salt than the water will take up. Cover the fish tightly. A good plan is to have a wooden cover that fits tightly into the container and is weighted with a heavy stone. Use only fresh fish. Do not use any old brine as it will spoil the fish.

FISH SALAD.

The salted cheeks and tongues of large fish make an excellent dish by themselves when soaked over night and boiled a few minutes.

Ways of Cooking Fish

CAPE COD SALT FISH DINNER.—Soak salt fish over night in cold water. If the fish are small, they should be boiled until tender, but salt codfish should be kept hot until tender, not boiled. Boil potatoes in salted water, drain and dry out in the oven. At the same time have cubes of salt pork slowly frying until crisp. Arrange the potatoes in the center of a platter. Cover with the fish cut into medium-sized pieces, and over all pour the pork fat and scraps. Surround with boiled beets, carrots and onions.

BAKED FISH LOAF.—Flake two cups of salt fish that has been soaked over night. Add one and one half cup of boiled rice, three mashed potatoes, six tablespoons of milk, one half teaspoon of salt, pepper, and two well-beaten eggs. When thoroughly mixed together, put into a square bread tin or other deep baking dish, lay over the top very thin bits of salt pork, sprinkle lightly with fine cracker-crumbs, and bake in a fairly hot oven until the pork is done and the loaf browned. Serve with a cream sauce.

CODFISH CREAMED WITH EGG.—Pull apart and cut in not too small pieces one cup of boneless codfish. Cover with cold water, soak about half an hour and drain. Put fish in frying pan, cover with cold water and very slowly bring to scalding point and drain again. In same frying pan put one cup of rich milk, and when at the simmering point add three tablespoons of butter creamed with one rounding teaspoon of dry flour and continually stir until it is blended and bubbles all over. Season with salt and pepper. Now add two cups of sliced boiled potato and when thoroughly hot spread the drained fish over the top and when heated through (without stirring) fold in one egg that has been lightly beaten with a fork and serve at once. The heat of the mixture will sufficiently cook the egg.

FISH SALAD WITH TOMATO OR PEPPERS.—Use fresh or canned whole tomato or green peppers. One small can of salmon flaked with a fork into small pieces, two cups of freshly boiled potato cut into small cubes, half a cup of celery cut fine, and one teaspoon of scraped onion. Mix together and stir in about one cup of boiled dressing. Take centers from tomatoes or peppers, and fill and surround with salad.

BOILED DRESSING.—Beat until light and creamy the yolk of one egg, add one quarter of a teaspoon of mustard, one half teaspoon of salt, a dash of cayenne pepper, three teaspoons of sugar, and one-third cup of thin cream. Beat well with the egg beater and then beat in the stiffly-beaten white of one egg and two tablespoons of good hot vinegar. Put in a double boiler and cook until it thickens like custard. Add it cold to salad. This dressing will keep in a preserving jar for two weeks.

FISH CAKES WITH PARSNIP BALLS.—Flake one cup of cold cooked fish and mix with it two cups of hot mashed potato, a grating of onion, two tablespoons of butter, two tablespoons of cream, the beaten yolk of one egg, and salt and pepper to taste. When cool, shape into cakes, roll in a little unbeaten white of egg and brown in hot fat.

PARSNIP BALLS.—Boil and mash parsnips. To one pint add pepper and salt to taste, two tablespoons of butter, and the beaten yolk of one egg. When cool, shape in balls, brush with unbeaten white of egg and roll in fine corn meal. Brown in a hot oven.

FISH AND BACON.—Bone smelts or other small pan fish, or use any larger fish cut into strip. Lay strips of bacon on a bake tin, and on each place a strip of fish. Sprinkle with a little flour, pepper and salt and bake in a hot oven. Freshly boiled and peeled potatoes may be placed in the pan to brown while the fish and bacon cook.

Spring Tonic Foods

Just at a time when our systems are a little below par, and require foods that contain tonic and blood-purifying elements, nature provides us with three of her best; dandelion, rhubarb and asparagus.

Dandelion, as long as we can remember, has been classed as a "cleansing" medicine. As a food, who does not look forward to the bright, appetizing bitter of dandelion greens, or eating raw the young tender plants as a salad?

Most welcome is the refreshing flavor of rhubarb, and the delicious sauces and desserts made from it after the long use of stored fruits. For those who do not care for or require the full amount of acid contained in rhubarb, ways of reducing it will be given below.

Asparagus is one of our most valuable vegetables and can be eaten by those having weak digestions. Over cooking destroys its fine flavor, and salt should not be added to the water until just before it is done. Twenty minutes' boiling in just enough water to cover is sufficient time unless the asparagus is old, in which case it is a still better plan to break off the tender ends and not put them into the water until the harder pieces are partly cooked. The water in which asparagus is cooked is a delicious addition to soups.

Another way to cook asparagus, and perhaps the best, is to tie it in even bunches and stand it on end in a deep kettle, adding boiling water to come half-way up the stalks. In this way the lower half is boiled, while the upper and more tender parts will steam cook. This method requires a little longer cooking. The kettle should be tightly covered.

ASPARAGUS ON TOAST.—Have ready a hot platter and some softened butter. If the oven is hot, make oven toast as it is better. Dip the toast very quickly in the water the asparagus is cooked in, and spread with the softened butter. Lay toast on hot platter, carefully lay the bunch of asparagus across it and cut the string, letting it fall apart. Pour over the warm butter, sprinkle with salt and pepper and serve at once.

ASPARAGUS SALAD.—Cook, drain and cool. Lay on lettuce leaves, grate over it a little hard-boiled egg and add boiled dressing.

STEAMED RHUBARB.—If the rhubarb is very young, wash and cut it in inch pieces without peeling. If old, it should be peeled. Put into a granite or agate-lined double boiler and add half as much sugar as there is rhubarb. Cook without stirring until very soft. When the rhubarb is very sour, add a few spoonfuls of water, steam a short time without sugar and drain. Add sugar and proceed as above. Steam baked in a tightly-covered earthen dish with the addition of grated orange rind, makes a delicious variation.

RHUBARB PUDDING.—If the rhubarb is too acid, after it is cut into pieces cover with boiling water, let stand five minutes and drain. Make into a rich sauce, using two cups of rhubarb, one half cup of raisins, the rind of half an orange and one cup of sugar. Beat the yolks of two eggs until light yellow, add one tablespoon of cold water and then stir into the rhubarb mixture. Spread one cup of boiled rice over the bottom of a pudding dish, and then add the rhubarb. Bake in a moderate oven until the egg is cooked. Cool and spread with a meringue made from two stiffly-beaten egg whites and two even tablespoons of sugar. Return to oven and lightly brown.

DANDELION DINNER.—Prepare dandelions by picking over and cutting off the roots close to top. Wash through several waters. Cover with boiling water, add a small piece of salt pork and cook. When nearly done, lay on top pared potatoes and steam cook.

DANDELION GREENS.—Prepare as above, and when nearly done put a little salt into the water. Drain, cut fine and add butter, salt and pepper. When cold they make a delicious salad combined with diced potato and boiled dressing.

DATE MUFFINS.—Mix together one cup of graham, one cup of white flour, one slightly rounding teaspoon of cream of tartar, half a teaspoon of soda, half a teaspon of salt, and two tablespoons of sugar. Skin, stone and cut into small pieces one dozen dates and work into the flour mixture. Beat together one cup of milk, one egg and one tablespoon of molasses and stir into the dry ingredients. Add three tablespoons of melted butter and beat hard until smooth. Bake in a moderately hot oven until brown. Makes one dozen.

MARSHMALLOW.—Soak one tablespoon of fine gelatine in one half cup of cold water twenty minutes. Dissolve with one half cup of boiling water. While hot, add one scant cup of sugar, stir until it dissolves, and cool. Add one teaspoon of vanilla. Beat the whites of four large or five small eggs until dry, and then add the gelatine syrup, one tablespoon at a time, beaten thoroughly in. Have ready melted over a steaming teakettle two squares of chocolate, and beat this into one half of the marshmallow. Pour into small round pan to set. Pour the remainder of marshmallow into a pan about one inch thick, and cut into squares with a sharp knife dipped into hot water. Roll in powdered sugar. An attractive dish is made by surrounding the chocolate cake of marshmallow with the white squares, and it may be served with cream, fruit sauces or soft custard.

A Gem of Destiny

OLD Miss Molly Carter, who had been governess at Rosecourt when Kitty Plair was a little girl, had a mania for traveling in vacation time. On one of these journeys—her last, as it proved, for the good soul, who was getting on in years, died soon after—she bought in San Francisco's Chinatown a jade necklace, which she sent as a birthday gift to Kitty Plair, down in Virginia. The particular Chinaman who kept the little curio store was ill at the time, so it happened that he never saw the jade necklace, which his wife had purchased from a white man who was plainly a dope fiend, and sadly wanting his drug, so that he parted from the necklace very cheaply. The woman merely made about five hundred percent on the trinket, so that if the fact had been known to her lord and master he would probably have beaten her very severely for letting it go at a sacrifice. However, if it hadn't been very cheap, Miss Molly couldn't have afforded it, and Kitty Plair would never have been its owner.

Kitty and her twin brother, Clint, were sole owners of Rosecourt, which had the loveliest roses and the barest fields of any plantation in the county. Kitty tended the roses and Clint plowed the fields with an ancient mule. All, including the mule, did their very best, but it seemed that the fields were worn out, needing all sorts of cultivation and fertilizers to coax the soil into producing, and these Clint didn't have.

"I'm ready to give up," he confided to his twin one spring day when the roses were all doing their level best to reach perfection, and nearly approaching it. "I hate to leave home, but there's no use—taxes eat up what little we make, and nobody wants to rent, the old house is in such bad repair. Reckon we'd better pull out and go to town, Kit; you can study stenography and I can clerk, or something like that, and study at night bookkeeping, or something. We'll rent us a little apartment and you can cook our meals over a gas jet for a while."

"How about Susie Cameron?" queried Kitty, who was fastening up a burdened vine; "look—Clint; did you ever see this yellow Lady Banks so full of blossoms before?"

"Pity we couldn't eat 'em," observed her twin, gloomily. "As to Susie—she'll wait for me, I reckon; if she doesn't I don't blame her—not a bit."

"I'm like Mr. Micawber, I always believe something'll turn up," said Kitty, cheerfully. "Anyway, I don't believe anybody will buy our house, though it does look fine from the road, with all these lovely flowers in bloom; gracious knows I work hard enough to keep it and the yard—our rose-garden. Well, don't let's cross bridges till we get to them. You know we are going in to town this afternoon to a reception given that British officer. It's a lawn party, like they have in England, you know. Susie Cameron says they want him to feel at home, so they'll have tea and—crumpets, I believe. I don't know what crumpets really are, but I reckon they are cakes. I bet Sally Lunn is a heap better."

"I met him," nodded Clint; "got wounded early in the war, and they sent him over here, invalided, to teach—instructor at a camp, I believe."

"I wonder why he doesn't go home, now the war's over?" mused Kitty, regarding her roses with a loving eye, and thinking but little of the Englishman.

"Been staying till he got good and well, I believe; been out in California for his health. Looks well enough, now, and I think he's on his way—will leave in a few days, Susie said. Say, Kit, did you know he was a real live lord—the eldest son of an earl—a viscount? Lord Leslie."

"Never saw one; but I know how they look—monocle, droopy mustache, a drawl and some very exclusive slang, patronized, apparently, by the nobility. I've read about 'em in stories."

"All right," chuckled her twin, "wait and see for yourself. What are you going to dike out in?"

"My lands, what a question! My white voile, of course!"

"That's it—white voile for summer, blue serge for winter. Kit, when we go to the city——"

"Hush up about the city! Something may turn up. A white voile doesn't fade, and it lasts two summers. A blue serge can be easily cleaned, and it lasts three winters. I stick to my colors!"

But, when she dressed for the lawn party that afternoon she considered the white voile with a meditative eye, wondering what she might wear in the way of accessories, for it wasn't every day that one was invited to meet a lord.

She finally tied on a green sash and put round her slim white throat—only it was sunburned, really—the jade necklace old Miss Molly had sent her, just the year before.

It was a queer thing, set in silver, with a huge oblong pendant of silver with a tiny jade idol dangling at the end.

"I don't think poor Miss Molly's necklace is improved by the pendant," thought Kitty, as she viewed her reflection in the tall pier-glass which had been her grandmother's—all of the furniture in the house had belonged to grands and great-grands, which was lucky for the twins, being made on principle and to last for several more generations, with good usage. "I think that I'll take it off before I wear it again. It's hammered on hard and fast, or I'd get Clint to take it off with his penknife. Anyway, it matches my sash, so I'll wear it for the jade."

She stuck a bunch of perfect Duchesse roses in her belt, and regarded her image with approval. "White voile, pink roses, green leaves, green sash, green necklace—and you're not so frightful looking your own self, Kitty Plair!"

She was not; there was nothing to frighten anybody in Kitty Plair's face, which was a soft, clear brown, with the pink showing ruddily through in lips and cheeks, and a dimple lurking in every out-of-the-way curve—dimples that were so charming one naturally watched for them to come out and play hide-and-seek.

There was nothing frightful in her eyes, which were the brownest, merriest mirrors of light and shadow; clear as sunlit streams, deep as the cool pools of the river, soft as the haze of evening, bright as the rays of morning—eyes that were very good to look upon in all their lights and shadows.

Her hair was dusky and soft with waves that broke out into fetching little curls when she gave them a chance, or the wind frolicked with them; her figure was small and rounded and firm, with brown, dimpled hands and arms that, because of her fresh youth, still showed no signs of the toil that would, in time, roughen and wrinkle them. Decidedly, Kitty Plair was anything but frightful. And Clint, her twin, was very much like her in a decidedly masculine way.

They were a very good-looking pair indeed as they walked briskly along the grassy border of the red road on their way to town—which folks outside called village. They walked in the grass to keep from getting dusty; it was only two miles, and just a fair walk, but they would have much preferred a vehicle, if they had owned one outside the wagon which was drawn in time of need by the ancient mule, hight Adam.

"I wish Adam were an automobile," said Kitty, critically, viewing her white slipper. "I say, Clint, we need a shower."

"Sure we do; and you might as well wish Adam were an airship while you are about it. I'd rather fly than ride in a smelly car, every time."

Clint had gone up a time or two in a "ship" with an army aviator; he considered himself hardly used because they refused him for that branch of the service. In fact, Clint had not had a dog's chance, he declared, in the big war, because it was ended before he could get across from the training camp—that injustice would always rankle in his memory—they went and finished before he had his chance!

Still, they looked very fresh and spotless when they reached the big, red-bricked home of the Camerons, set in a tree-shaded lawn of soft sward thick as carpet, whereon a gay company moved about among tables and benches, chatting, drinking tea—which not many of them liked, and flocking like a big bunch of many-colored blossoms about a tall, slender, rather good-looking young man, guiltless of monocle or mustache, and talking, apparently, in English that was quite free from slang—Lord Leslie, or Major Leslie, as he preferred to be termed, the son of an earl and a real, live lord.

Kitty, watching intently for some choice specimen of lordly slang, was disappointed, she told herself, to find that he was just a nice, ordinary young man. From the first he seemed fascinated by that young lady; he did not talk very much, but he stared—actually stared at her all the time.

"I couldn't make out whether it was my sash, my roses or my necklace, for he didn't get as far as my face," she confided to Clint, as they took their way homeward. "What do you reckon it was, Clint?"

"Don't know—surely not that old white rag you wear; if you wore pink or red, or something striking—and that necklace Miss Molly gave you is ugly as the devil!"

"Must have been my roses, then," decided Kitty, tranquilly patting them, "but they are all withered now."

Next morning Kitty was kneading bread in the kitchen when Mattietta, the small colored girl who was her one servant, came in with round eyes. "White man out to de front, Miss Kitty, say kin he see you, please ma'am."

"Agent," declared Kitty, up to her elbows in dough; "I can't leave my bread, Mattietta—bring him round to the back of the house—not through it, mind—I don't trust agents too much."

Mattietta obeyed, marching in at the kitchen door and standing aside to let in the white man, who had meekly followed her round the house. "Here he is, Miss Kitty."

It was the English Major—the lord, eldest son—and presumably heir of an earl!

"For goodness sakes!" breathed Kitty, from her rolling board—"I thought you were an agent! Mattietta, set a chair for the gentleman. If you'll just excuse me while I finish my dough—you know how it is when you're working light-bread—you just can't let it get cold—or it falls flat."

"Yes—oh, yes indeed," agreed the Major, heartily; "I'm in no hurry—not the slightest, take your own time."

And right then and there, without the slightest intention on the earth, the earl's heir fell head over ears in love with Kitty Plair!

She was so charming, so utterly unconscious, and so terribly beautiful in a faded pink gingham bungalow apron, with short sleeves and a dutch neck, as she kneaded the dough with firm, dimpled hands; a smudge of flour on her nose, of course, which but added to her beauty, the major thought as he watched her, and forgot his errand.

"Run out to the three-acre field and call Mr. Clint, Mattietta—he's plowing potatoes," said Kitty, quite as a matter of course.

"Do——please don't interrupt your brother," begged the lord, earnestly. "I came—I came."

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

The door yielded. She pushed it open a little way.

With a shriek, followed by a wild cry "Violet!," then all was still.

"Belle," she cried, indignantly. "You have betrayed me!"

She fell forward in a dead faint.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

On a car, going up a steep hill, leading to the Zoological Gardens of Cincinnati, is Violet Draper Huntington. Opposite her sits Wallace Richardson. Nearly at the top of the hill, something beneath the car breaks. Wallace seizes Violet's hands and locking them behind his neck commands her to cling. The car crashes down, burying all the passengers beneath the ruins. They are the only two alive and hurried to Wallace Richardson's home, are cared for by his mother. Mrs. Mencke, Violet's sister provides a nurse and leaves orders for Violet to see no one. The nurse out for a walk, Violet goes to the adjoining room to meet Wallace and thank him for the life saved. As they become more friendly, Wallace realizes his danger and Violet is hopelessly in love. Violet asks Wallace to come with his mother to see her. Mrs. Mencke takes Violet to Saratoga for two months, then to Cincinnati, and home. The following day, picking up a paper, Violet reads of Mrs. Richardson's death. She goes to the Richardsons' house and expresses her sympathy to Wallace, who unconsciously calls her my darling, and asks her forgiveness. As she whispers, "I am glad," he knows she is all his own. Returning home, her sister demands where she has been, and learning it was at Mrs. Richardson's funeral, that she rides in the carriage with Wallace and Mrs. Dent, Mrs. Mencke denounces it as questionable and that she must drop him for all time. Wallace, calling upon Violet, Mr. and Mrs. Mencke return and she introduces him and admits he is her promised husband. She overhears Belle's and her husband's scheme to place her in a convent. Mrs. Mencke, proposing a trip to Montreal, Violet refuses to go, and Mrs. Mencke takes Mrs. Hawley, who is to sail for Europe and chaperone Nellie Bailey, into her confidence and requests her to induce Violet to join them. Violet makes ready for the proposed trip and Wallace is at the steamer to say good by. Vane Cameron and Ralph Henderson join Mr. and Mrs. Hawley's party and before the voyage is over Vane Cameron surrenders his heart to Violet. Mrs. Mencke schemes that no letters pass between Violet and Wallace and later, joining the party in Europe, gives her permission for Vane to win Violet. Failing to get Violet's consent, she produces a notice of Wallace Richardson's death, which throws Violet into a severe sickness, leaving her sad and heartbroken. She confesses to Vane her love for Wallace Richardson, her sister's opposition, concealing nothing. Knowing she is unhappy from causes other than Wallace's death, Vane urges her to allow him to give her his name, to shield her from sorrow and care. Violet, afraid to yield, hesitates, but later she consents to what he thinks best, but with many misgivings. Mrs. Mencke, entering Violet's room, finds the bed made and the room in order and no trace discovered of her. Four weeks later, Lord Cameron sees the body of a woman upon the beach clad in dark grey suit with bands of blue silk. Believing it is Violet, he selects a spot near the sea for burial. The next day a stranger appears and requests to meet the woman reported to have married Lord Cameron. Being questioned by the Menckes his right, he produces the marriage certificate and Vane Cameron confirms it by Violet's admission of it to him, the treatment received, her disappearance and later the finding of her body by drowning and the burial. Wallace falls unconscious and Lady Cameron and Vane remain with Wallace through a severe illness, after which he returns to New York, building up a fine business. In the meanwhile, Wilhelm Mencke squanders all at the gaming table and Mrs. Mencke goes to Cincinnati from which place she suddenly disappears. Violet comes to New York, securing a position as governess for Bertha Lawrence, who is partially blind and possessed of a strong will. She wins her affections, Mr. Lawrence treating her as a member of the family, and alone with himself determines to win Violet. Wilhelm Mencke secures Violet's address and learns that Wallace Richardson is in the city. Calling upon him and desiring to raise money, he offers Violet's jewelry for two thousand dollars. Wallace objects. As the husband of Violet, he is the legal heir and will give a sum which may be named as their value and fifty dollars. Jonas Huntington dies, leaving a fortune to his niece, Violet Huntington. She, supposed to be dead, the nearest heir is Mrs. Wilhelm Mencke, for whom search is being made. Wilhelm Mencke, to secure this property, schemes to get Violet in his power. He haunts Fifth Avenue and learns of her movements. Bertha Lawrence, meeting with an accident, is lovingly cared for by Violet, until her death, after which she proposes to look for employment. Mr. Lawrence, in his gratitude, desires to adopt her as his daughter and heiress. Violet, going out at dusk, is accosted by Mencke. She steps around the corner of a street, when she is suddenly seized and thrust into a carriage, and carried to a scantily furnished apartment where she is waited upon by a woman who is sworn to guard her. Lord Cameron, still in the city, receives many invitations, and secures favors for Wallace. The first they attend, Lord Cameron meets and is charmed with Alice Humphrey who later promises to be his wife. Wilhelm Mencke calls on Violet and fails to get her signature. Dropping a letter, which Violet reads, she learns why she is kidnapped. Determined to escape, through strategy she obtains a pair of pincers and succeeds in turning the key. Making her way to the roof she lifts a scuttle and slipping through descends the narrow stairs.

CHAPTER XXXII.

AN UNEXPECTED MEETING.

EVIDENTLY nobody had been disturbed by the noise of the falling glass, for all was quiet in the upper story when Violet reached the foot of the scuttle stairs.

She groped her way around to the head of the next flight, and cautiously descended them.

Upon reaching the bottom, she caught sight of a streak of light shining through a crack beneath a door just in front of her.

This led her to suppose there was a room beyond, and doubtless there was some one in it. She felt that she would have to be very cautious in her movements, or she would be detected, and her aim was to make her way straight to the street door, and get out without disturbing any one.

Very softly she felt all about her, but could find no stair railing, as in the house from which she had just fled. She seemed to be inclosed in a small space, the only outlet to which was the door below which she could see the light streaming, and the stairs behind her, and she at once surmised that this house was divided into two tenements and so arranged that no one could get into the attic who did not belong in this portion of the house.

What should she do in this unforeseen emergency?

She must get out some way, for she could not stay there all night, and she was liable to be discovered at any moment.

She thought of going back through the scuttle and trying some other; but if the houses were all arranged like this, she would be no better off. She approached the door and listened; but she could hear no sound within the lighted room. Perhaps it was only a hall, after all, and she had only to boldly push her way on, in order to quickly get out of her difficulty.

She felt for the handle of the door—found it—turned it.

The door yielded. She pushed it open a little way, and saw a poorly furnished chamber beyond. There was no carpet on the floor—only a rug or two. A scant fire was burning in a small stove. In one corner there was quite a comfortable-looking bed, upon which there lay the form of a woman—or at least Violet judged so from the cap which covered the head upon the pillow.

A small table stood beside it, upon which there was a lamp, a cup, and some vials containing medicine.

There was also another table opposite, and this, with two ordinary chairs and a rocker, completed the furnishings of the room.

There was another door opposite the one through which Violet was looking, and she was sure that it must lead out to another stairway, while it was evident that she could escape no other way.

The occupant of the bed appeared to be sleeping, and the young girl wondered if it would be possible for her to cross the room and get out without waking her. It would be a hazardous attempt, but she must make it.

She pushed the door a little farther—it creaked sharply upon its hinges, and Violet's heart leaped into her throat with sudden fear.

The sleeper did not stir, however, and, after a moment, Violet stepped inside the room, closed the door behind her without making a sound, and then glided noiselessly toward the one opposite.

She had just reached it, and was about to open it, when the woman upon the bed suddenly turned over and opened her eyes.

She saw the intruder instantly, stared at her in blank wonder for a moment, then she threw up her arms, with a shriek, followed by the wild cry of "Violet!" then all was still.

The woman upon the bed was Mrs. Mencke—Violet had recognized her instantly, and stood spellbound with amazement—and she had fainted from fright, believing her sister had appeared to her as a spirit.

That cry unlocked Violet's stupefied senses.

"Belle!" she cried, rushing to her side and grasping her cold hands in hers, while a feeling of horror and dismay overwhelmed her at finding her sister living in such apparent poverty, and ill besides.

All thought of self or of past injuries was swept out of sight in view of her wretched condition, and, hastily throwing off her cap and ulster, she at once set herself at work to do what she could for her restoration and comfort.

Mrs. Mencke was not long in returning to consciousness; but the wild look of fear returned to her eyes when she again opened them and they rested upon her sister, and the young girl knew that she still believed her to be an apparition.

"Violet!" breathed the woman, in an awe-stricken, scarcely audible tone.

"Yes, Belle, I am Violet," she said, smiling reassuringly. "Don't look so frightened. I know that you have long believed me to be dead, but it was all a dreadful mistake. See!" she continued, clasping her hands again; "is not this hand good, substantial flesh? No spirit ever had such warm, strong fingers as these."

Mrs. Mencke shivered and drew away from her.

"No, you cannot be Violet," she said, in a hollow voice, a half-dazed look still on her face, "though you have her face and voice and ways, for she was drowned—the fishermen and Lord Cameron found her body and buried it at Mentone, and——"

"It was not my body, Belle," Violet interrupted, anxious to set her sister's mind at rest, "but that of a poor peasant girl with whom I exchanged clothing so that I could more easily escape detection. Now be sensible, Belle, and don't look so dreadfully frightened. I am going to sit right down here beside you and tell you all about my running away."

"It can't be possible!" reiterated Mrs. Mencke, but her blank look was beginning to give place to one of credulity, and her natural color to return to cheek and lips.

"Indeed it is possible and true," Violet persisted, "and I will prove it to you. I couldn't marry Lord Cameron, Belle, for I did not love him. I knew I should make him miserable and be very unhappy myself, so I ran away at the last moment to save him as well as myself. I was so afraid that you would trace me I made this peasant girl let me have her costume for mine, and she must have fallen from the cliff after leaving me—it could have been no one else."

Violet then went on to tell her of all that had occurred since, until she finally succeeded in proving to her that she was indeed the sister whom she believed she had left lying in the church-yard at Mentone.

"Well, it seems very wonderful," she said, when Violet concluded the story of her flight and return to America. "I can hardly believe that I am not dreaming after all. But where have you been since your return, and what have you been doing all this time?"

"I have been living here in New York and teaching a little blind girl," Violet told her.

"How well you are looking," said Mrs. Mencke, thinking that she had grown prettier than ever. "No one would imagine that you missed your money at all, nor the luxuries to which you have always been accustomed. Oh, it is dreadful to be poor!" and the unhappy woman looked around her poverty-stricken room with a groan of anguish.

"Yes, it must be hard to be poor and sick, too, Belle," Violet said, in a tone of sympathy, for she could not treasure unkind feelings against her sister in her present condition. "But," she added, brightly, "as for me, I have not minded it much. I have rather enjoyed my work and the feeling of independence it has brought with it. I have begun to realize that I can be of some use in the world, instead of the idle, inefficient girl that I used to be. I will never lead such a life again—if I should ever be rich again, so that I shall not need to do anything for myself, I will work for others. But how does it happen, Belle, that I find you in such a woeful strait? Have you been sick long?"

"No; I am not really sick. I have only a heavy cold, and went directly to bed after taking an early supper. "But," with a moan, "I never thought I should come to this—to think that a Huntington should ever have to live in such a room and from hand to mouth, as I have had to do of late. Violet, it is dreadful!" and she began to wring her hands and sob in a heart-broken way that touched her companion deeply.

"Hush, Belle," she said, kindly. "If you have suffered you shall suffer no longer. I have money, and," remembering the letter which Wilhelm Mencke had dropped, "I shall probably have a good deal more soon. But tell me how you came to be so very poor, and all about yourself."

She did not think it best just then to say anything about her husband or to tell her that she knew aught regarding his movements.

"Well, to begin with," Mrs. Mencke replied, and assuming a mournful, complaining tone, "you can imagine that it was a terrible disappointment and shock to me to have things turn out as they did at Mentone, and then all that followed after you ran away—you know, I suppose—don't you know——"

"Do I not know what, Belle?" Violet inquired, wondering what made her stammer so, and regard her so strangely.

Mrs. Mencke had been upon the point of saying something about Wallace's sudden appearance at Mentone, when it occurred to her that Violet had not mentioned his name, in relating her experiences since her flight, and possibly she might not know, even now, that he was living. If she did not already know how she had been deceived regarding his supposed death, the woman thought that there would be no need of confessing her share in the deception just at present.

"Of course you must know," she answered, recovering herself, "that Lord Cameron would blame me for what occurred. He naturally inferred that I knew how you shrank from the marriage, and resented it because I kept the fact from him, so of course there were hard feelings and an estrangement. Wilhelm and I spent the remainder of that summer in Switzerland, returning to London in the fall. Wilhelm had been getting into bad habits ever since we began to travel—and even before we left home, I imagine, if the truth were known, but after that denouement at Mentone he drank more deeply than ever, and gambled constantly. Of course our money melted away like ice in midsummer, and one night he burst in upon me saying that our last dollar was gone. You can imagine what followed. I was furious, and said a great deal that I should not have said in calmer moments, and he suddenly absconded, taking with him all your jewelry and some of mine."

"Why, Belle, did he dare do that?" Violet cried, indignantly.

"Yes," said Mrs. Mencke, "I expect he was half-crazed from his ill-luck and drink, and, not having any money, or at least not very much, he did not know what else to do. Fortunately I had enough to pay my bills and bring me back to America, and I returned almost immediately. Of course I would not go back to Cincinnati where we had always been at the top of the ladder, and so I concluded to bury myself here where no one knew me. I sold a piece or two of my jewelry, hired a room and furnished it, then tried to get something to do to support myself, but I was not used to work. I tried sewing and just managed to get along, when I took a sudden cold, had rheumatic fever, and was laid up for weeks. I could not do very much for a long time after that; my funds became low. I had to leave my comfortable room, and was finally reduced to this. I have lived here for several months, and have managed to get enough to eat by making lace—that German lace that mamma taught us how to make when we were children—but it has been hard work, and the shame of it has nearly killed me."

Violet well knew that her sister's proud spirit must have suffered tortures over her downfall, and she fetl a deep pity for her.

"But, Belle, you had lots of diamonds—they were worth a small fortune. Could you not have sold them, and lived better than this?" she asked.

"Sold my diamonds!" exclaimed the woman, aghast. "No, indeed; they were all that I had left, except my clothes of better days, and I would have lived upon a crust before I would have parted with them."

"But they surely could have been of no earthly use to you in your present condition," said Violet, thinking that bread was better than stones when a person was hungry.

"I know it, but I love them, and I will never part with them; something may yet happen to restore me to my former position. Oh, Violet, if you had only been sensible—if you had never fallen in love with that miserable carpenter, you could have married Lord Cameron, and all this trouble never need have come upon us," she wailed, in conclusion.

Violet flushed. She thought it was very hard and unjust that she should be blamed thus for what could not have been the result of any fault of hers.

"Hush, Belle," she said, keen pain in her tone. "I loved Wallace—I love him still, even though he is gone, and I never could become the wife of any man while his image filled my heart. You should not blame me for your misfortunes, when I have had nothing to do with them."

"She does not dream that he is living," Mrs. Mencke said to herself, and then, while she was revolving in her mind whether it would be best to undeceive her, Violet changed the subject by asking:

"Have you ever heard anything from Wilhelm since he left you in London?"

"No, and I don't think I ever wish to," the woman replied, a frown settling upon her brow. "He behaved so abominably during those last few months and has got to be such a gambler and spendthrift that I believe I am better off away from him. I imagine that you do not care very much about seeing him again, for he has spent all your money as well as mine."

"No," Violet returned, flushing, "I do not think that I care to meet him."

"I cannot understand how you happened to find me out," Mrs. Mencke suddenly remarked, "and you came in by the door leading from the attic, too; how could that be possible when everybody has to pass through this room to get up there?"

Violet had been wondering how she should explain her presence there, and she now concluded that she could give no reason but the real one, and so she resolved to tell her sister the whole truth.

She saw that she was feeling very bitterly toward her husband on account of his treatment of her, and so she believed she would sympathize with her if she should tell her how she had recently been abducted and kept a prisoner.

"Why don't you answer me, Violet?" Mrs. Mencke demanded. "It is the strangest thing in the world, and now I think of it, you looked as if you were trying to get out at the door without my seeing you. I hired this room and the attic because they were cut off from the rest of the house; my trunks and all my fine clothes are up there so no one can get at them without my knowing it."

"Well, Belle, if you must know, I came in through the skylight," Violet said, seeing she must explain.

"Through the skylight? Good gracious! how could you do that? Wasn't it fastened?" exclaimed her sister, in alarm.

"Yes, but I broke a pane of glass and unfastened it."

"But how came you up there on the roof?"

"I came out of another house at the end of the block—in fact, Belle, I have been locked up in one of the houses at the farther end of the block for the last three or four weeks, but succeeded in getting away today by walking over the roofs and, as it happened, stumbled upon you here."

"What can you mean?" cried Mrs. Mencke, sit-

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

WITH all the world at the spring o' the year and everything so beautiful, even the thought of gossip seems out of place. But since it is here, there and everywhere, and nine times out of ten unintentional, the following poem (sent in by a Colorado sister) may serve to make someone think twice, three times, before carelessly repeating something that had better be forgotten.—Ed.

The Three Gates

"If you are tempted to reveal
A tale someone to you has told
About another, make it pass
Before you speak, three gates of gold.

"Three narrow gates—First, 'Is it true?'
Then, 'Is it needful?' In your mind
Give faithful answer. And the next
Is the last and narrowest, 'Is it kind?'

"And if to reach your lips at last
It passes through these gateways three
Then you may tell the tale, nor fear
What the results of speech may be."

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Let us send up three cheers for the Daddy of "Subscriber." I am with him on the check question. Let us see how many of us can hold as a souvenir a check with Uncle Charlie's signature and the prints of the Goat's pearly teeth on the corner. I raised only one hundred pennies and you will say I needn't make such a fuss over so small an amount, but I am almost sixty years old and not in good health.

ONE OF UNCLE CHARLIE'S ADMIRERS.

BATESVILLE, 143 S. Park Ave., IND.

HOWDY EVERYBODY:

Slowly now and cautiously with sidelong glances under Mrs. Wilkinson's table and all the chairs—a deep sigh of relief—for no goat is in sight just now but I'm thoroughly convinced that a cousin or nearer kin, to Uncle Charlie's Billy inhabits this office also, as it completely devoured my last letters. Such an appetite. Ugh!

Here's my donation to Uncle Charlie's Home Fund. How was it earned? Oh, it's only a tenth, the whole of which was earned darnin' socks, washin' dishes and such like.

Any one care to try my recipe to give the face a good color? "Get a pot of rouge and a rabbit's foot. Bury them two miles from home and walk out once a day to see if they are still there."

Some one please strike the chords of "Back Home Again in Indiana," where I'll be glad to meet the "hull" crowd of you anytime.

By, by, MISS EDNA STOCKINGER.

This picture was taken when she was one year and nine months old. She has black hair, big brown eyes and rosy cheeks.

We live in the country and I enjoy the outdoor life and think it the only place for children although the city offers better advantages in the way of education.

Pearl Vesey and Nelle Fischer, your letters are fine.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

A READER from the state of Mexico sends us a recipe for a dish that is well known in her state and it would add variety to the Sisters' Recipes if others would follow her example and tell us how to prepare some particular food for which their state or locality is famed. And remember that while you may know just how much "enough," or "a little" is, a great many of us do not, so give exact measurements. —Ed.

TAMALES.—Put corn husks, either fresh or dried, to soften in warm water. In a tablespoon of lard or beef fat put one large onion thinly sliced with two cloves of garlic and fry well but do not brown. Add to this one and a half cups of any cooked meat finely minced, one tablespoon of chile powder, and enough gravy to make the mixture the consistency of dough. Stir and cook about two minutes, then set aside. Put two cups of boiling water, or gravy and water, into a stew-pan, season with a scant teaspoon of salt, two even teaspoons of chile powder and one tablespoon of fat, and, when boiling hard, slowly add one cup of dry corn meal and cook slowly about half an hour. Wipe husks dry with a clean cloth, and on each spread a little of the mush, making it about three or four inches long. To every five husks covered with mush, to one add a large spoonful of the meat mixture and spread smooth, pressing into the meat a few raisins and sliced olives. Over this put a husk of plain mush so the meat will be entirely covered, and on either side one more. It should be about the size of an ear of corn. Tie with ribbons of the corn husk at each end and with scissors trim evenly at each end. Steam one hour with water in steamer kept boiling hard.—MEXICO SISTER, Mexico.

BAKED HALIBUT.—Boil two pounds of halibut from twenty to thirty minutes; take out the bones and break the meat into small pieces; mix four hard-boiled eggs, sliced, and four ground crackers with the fish. Add a pint and a half of milk, half a cup of butter and salt and pepper to taste. Bake one hour.

FISH SALAD.—Take one pound of baked fresh cod or any kind of cooked fish and chop fine; pour over it a dressing made as follows: Two eggs, three tablespoons vinegar, one tablespoon of cream, one teaspoon of sugar, one quarter of a teaspoon of salt and one quarter of a teaspoon of mustard. Cook in double boiler until thickness of cream.

FISH CHOWDER.—One half pound pork, one fresh haddock, and one quart sliced potatoes. Fry the pork in a deep kettle; then add a layer of fish and a layer of potatoes, with a sprinkling of salt, pepper and flour. Cover nearly to top with boiling water and cook twenty minutes. Add one quart of boiling milk when ready to serve.

VEAL LOAF.—Two pounds of veal, one egg, small piece of salt pork, one onion, one cup cracker-crumbs, one tablespoon cream. Grind meat, onion and crackers, add egg, cream and seasoning. Put in buttered tin and bake one hour.—MRS. FRANK THOMAS, Thief River Falls, Minn.

COCOANUT BALLS.—If fresh cocoanut is not available, use the dried, first soaking it in whatever amount of fresh milk it will absorb. To each two cups of cocoanut add one cup of sugar, powdered preferable. Add two tablespoons of flour, and one well-beaten white of egg. Mix thoroughly, shape into balls, roll in powdered sugar and bake in a slow oven twenty minutes. If cakes are preferred, flatten the balls.

POTATO SALAD.—Peel and slice enough cold boiled potatoes to fill a quart dish; salt and pepper to taste; chop two small onions very fine and mix with them. Put half a cup of vinegar and one teaspoon of butter in a dish and let it heat gradually. Beat the yolks of two eggs thoroughly, pour into a cup and fill cup with thick sweet cream; beat well together and pour into the vinegar. Stir constantly until it reaches the boiling point, then pour it over the potatoes and mix thoroughly. Serve cold.

RICE RECIPE.—Cook rice in salted water until done. Make a tomato gravy as follows: One half can tomatoes, or ripe tomatoes in equal proportions, season with salt, bay leaf, paprika, a little soda and a small onion cut into small pieces. Add a cup of water and boil five minutes. Now fry a tablespoon of flour in two level tablespoons of butter and add tomato pulp and let boil until it thickens. Pour this over rice and serve at once or put rice in baking dish with alternate layers of bread-crumbs and tomatoes and bake. Beans and macaroni may be fixed the same way.—MRS. F. C. W., California.

BAKED ONIONS.—Select smooth, evenly sized onions, place in baking sheet and bake half an hour in a quick oven. Pare off the burnt skins, season well with salt and pepper, add butter and serve.

STEAMED PARSNIPS.—Wash and scrape clean, steam one hour, then cut into thin slices and season with salt and pepper. Add plenty of butter and serve.

PRUNE SHORTCAKE.—One pint of flour, one teaspoon of cream of tartar, half a teaspoon of soda, and half a teaspoon of salt stirred together. Rub in one third of a cup of butter, or chicken fat. Beat one egg, add one scant cup of milk and stir it into the dry ingredients. Pour dough into a cake tin, cover top with a sprinkling of sugar, and bake. Remove from tin, let partly cool, then cover the top and sides with whipped cream and arrange rows of steamed prunes on top and around cake. Serve at once.

PRUNE SHORTCAKE.

PRUNE COOKIES.—One cup sugar, one half cup shortening, one cup of prunes, chopped fine, one quarter cup of milk, three teaspoons baking powder, one half teaspoon cinnamon, one half teaspoon salt and four cups of flour or enough to roll. Cream the sugar, shortening and prunes together; add milk, cinnamon and salt; sift the baking powder with three cups of flour and add; then add as much flour as needed to roll dough to quarter inch thick. Cut out and bake in hot oven fifteen minutes.

PRUNE SPONGE.—Dissolve two tablespoons of gelatine in one and one half cups boiling water. Add one and one half cups of prune juice and enough sugar to suit taste. As soon as it begins to set, beat it with an egg beater until light and foamy, then fold in one cup of sweetened whipped cream and pour into mould to harden. When ready to serve garnish with whole cooked prunes and whipped cream.

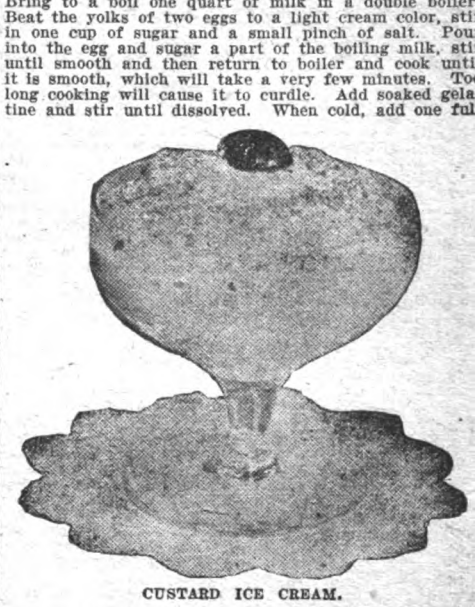
SALAD DRESSING.—For one quart of diced vegetables put in a small bowl one level teaspoon of salt and one third of a teaspoon of pepper; mix, and gradually beat in six tablespoons of salad oil and two of vinegar. Mix thoroughly through vegetables and serve.

TRIPE IN TOMATO SAUCE.—(Italian Style). Put two tablespoons of butter in pan, add four chopped onions and quite a lot of chopped parsley. When well done, add one cup of canned tomato and salt and pepper to taste, with a dash of spices if preferred. Have tripe clean and cut into strips. Put into sauce and cook one hour. Add water to prevent burning.—MRS. ALFRED BEETORI, Meadeville, Mont.

SPONGE CAKE.—Two eggs, one half cup sugar, one cup corn syrup, two tablespoons hot water, one teaspoon lemon extract, one cup corn flour, one and one half teaspoons baking powder, one half teaspoon salt. Beat yolks of eggs until thick and lemon-colored; add sugar and continue beating. Add syrup, water and extract. Sift dry ingredients together and add alternately with stiffly-beaten whites of eggs to first mixture. Bake in moderate oven.

BARLEY AND ROLLED OATS DROP COOKIES.—One cup barley flour, one and one fourth cup rolled oats, one half cup fat, one fourth cup brown sugar, one half cup corn syrup, one egg, two teaspoons baking powder, one half teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon cinnamon, one half cup nuts, one half cup raisins. Cream the fat and sugar; add syrup and beaten egg. Mix dry ingredients and add to first mixture. Drop from a teaspoon upon a greased pan and bake in a moderate oven.—U. S. DEPT. AGRICULTURE.

DOUGHNUTS.—One cup sour cream, one teaspoon soda, one cup sugar, three eggs, a little salt, ginger and cinnamon, and flour enough to make dough to roll. Fry in hot fat.



HOT WATER GINGERBREAD.—One egg, one third cup sugar, two thirds cup molasses, two tablespoons fat, one and one half cup barley flour, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon salt, one half teaspoon ginger, one half teaspoon cinnamon, two thirds cup boiling water. Combine the egg, sugar, molasses and melted fat. Sift together the dry ingredients and add alternately with the boiling water. (This cake may be made with buttermilk, omitting the egg and fat.)

BARLEY SPICED CAKE.—One half cup fat, two thirds cup sugar, one cup corn syrup, three eggs, three fourths cup milk, one teaspoon vanilla, one half teaspoon ginger, one teaspoon cinnamon, one half teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon allspice, one fourth teaspoon salt, six teaspoons baking powder, three and three fourths cups barley flour, one cup of raisins. Cream the fat, sugar and egg yolks. Add the syrup and mix well. Add alternately the liquid and dry ingredients sifted together. Add the flavoring, and fold in the well-beaten whites of the eggs. Bake for one hour, starting in a moderate oven and after twenty minutes increase the heat to a hot oven. (This makes a large cake.)—U. S. DEPT. AGRICULTURE.

MAPLE SUGAR CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, one cup of sweet milk, three quarters of a cup of butter, three cups of flour, three heaping teaspoons of baking powder, four eggs, beaten separately. Use maple sugar for frosting.—MRS. EARL SPINDLER, Strasburg, Ohio.

EGG DUMPLINGS.—Beat two eggs, add one quarter teaspoon salt, two tablespoons milk. Sift one cup of flour with one scant teaspoon baking powder, add egg mixture and more flour if necessary to make thick batter. Drop by half teaspoonfuls in boiling broth. Cover and cook for ten minutes.—MISS BERNICE RUMMER, Lowell, Ohio.

CUSTARD ICE CREAM.—One teaspoon of fine gelatine soaked in three tablespoons of cold milk twenty minutes. Bring to a boil one quart of milk in a double boiler. Beat the yolks of two eggs to a light cream color, stir in one cup of sugar and a small pinch of salt. Pour into the egg and sugar a part of the boiling milk, stir until smooth and then return to boiler and cook until it is smooth, which will take a very few minutes. Too long cooking will cause it to curdle. Add soaked gelatine and stir until dissolved. When cold, add one full teaspoon of vanilla, and pack to freeze. After twenty minutes begin turning freezer, and when the custard is about half frozen, add the two whites of eggs beaten stiff and continue turning until the custard is firm.

MOCHA CAKE.—Beat yolks and whites of three eggs separately, then beat well together. Add slowly one cup of sugar, beating while adding. Then add one and one half cups of flour to which has been added one teaspoon of baking powder. COTTAGE PUDDING.—Two heaping cups of flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one half teaspoon salt, one egg, three quarters cup of sugar, three tablespoons melted butter and one cup of milk. Mix the salt and baking powder with the flour. Beat the egg, add the sugar, melted butter and milk and stir in the flour. Bake in a shallow pan.

SAUCE.—One half cup butter, one cup powdered sugar; cream and add one pint of mashed strawberries (canned ones will do), and last the beaten white of an egg.—MISS PEARL L. GUNTER, Ellisville, Miss.

APPLE CUSTARD PIE.—One cup cooked apple, one cup corn syrup, two tablespoons sugar, one and one half tablespoons corn-starch, one tablespoon butter, one teaspoon lemon extract, one egg yolk. Combine the ingredients and cook in a double boiler until thick. Fill pie shell, cover with meringue made from stiffly-beaten white of egg and two tablespoons syrup. Brown in oven.

RICE PIE CRUST.—Line a greased pie pan with cold boiled rice, bringing the rice well over the edge of the pan and shaping it with a spoon dipped in milk. Bake the crust in a moderate oven until it is slightly brown. Use the crust like any pastry for a one-crust pie.

RICE CREAM.—Boil a cup of rice in sweet milk until soft, adding sugar and salt to taste; pour into cups, and, when cool, turn out into a dish, scoop a little piece out the top of each, and fill the space with jelly; beat a cup of cream until stiff, sweeten and season, and pour over the rice.

"You are always thoughtful, Tonita", said Beryl gratefully.

With a despairing cry, Beryl dashed forward.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Nicholas Berdyne, past middle age, his face marred by dissipation, schemes with Hartley Trenwyck to win Beryl Grayson, whose father is dead. She is engaged to Neil Preston, who goes to Alaska in the interest of a mine owned by Grayson and which falls into Berdyne's hands. Neil Preston is reported dead by Dave Gorsline, who is hired by Berdyne to tell Beryl. In her sorrow and loss of wealth, she refuses continued aid from Berdyne. Mr. Jackman from Denver, wanting to repay a debt owed to Beryl's father, invites Beryl to his ranch, where she forms a friendship for Tonita, a beautiful Mexican girl, who advises her not to marry Berdyne through any mistaken idea of gratitude. Irma Lee, discarded by Berdyne, warns Beryl that he serves his own selfish purpose and that Neil Preston lives and is on his way to Jackman's Ranch. Berdyne, persistent that Beryl shall become his wife, Neil Preston, overhearing her denunciation of his baseness and treachery and refusing to marry him, confronts Berdyne who swears he will follow his trail. The day Beryl Grayson becomes Berdyne's wife, Morley Preston, opposed to Neil's marriage, will tender Trenwyck a check for five thousand dollars and Berdyne will give a like sum. He admits Beryl's trust in Jackson and that the letter written offering her the home was inspired by him, that he holds a heavy mortgage on the Jackman ranch, and with this knowledge they plot to separate the lovers who plan to be married the following day. Jackman, a tool in Berdyne's and Trenwyck's hands, drugs the wine which he gives Beryl when he drinks with her to her happiness, and she, feeling dizzy and faint, goes to her room and the door is locked. Neil Preston, returning for Beryl, meets Tonita. Approaching Jackman's house, an automobile is in waiting and a man with Beryl in his arms appears from the house and lifts her into the car. Preston strikes him down, and taking the auto, with Tonita, they make their escape through the night for San Francisco. Trenwyck advises Berdyne not to go too far. Not to be foiled in capturing Beryl, they take an early train to San Francisco, wiring Gorsline to watch for the auto, the Red Flyer, which he locates near the residence of a minister, who is called early to perform a marriage ceremony, which is scarcely over, when there is a summons from the door. Berdyne enters, and Neil, struggling to defend his wife, reels and falls to the floor mid the chaos of an earthquake, while Beryl is borne helplessly away. Making her escape, she wanders back to Pine Street, searching the wrecked house in vain for her husband, who is hurried to a temporary hospital by Tonita. She leaves a note for Neil that Berdyne has taken Beryl in the Red Flyer. Neil, regaining consciousness, goes in search of his wife, and seeing the wreck of the machine, knows that Beryl has escaped from Berdyne. Trenwyck, in league with Gorsline, meeting Beryl, assures her that Tonita is waiting for her on Sutter Street, and, unconscious of treachery, she goes with Trenwyck, where she is made a prisoner by Gorsline. Neil, wandering on Portsmouth Square, recognizes Trenwyck and following him sees him enter the house to which Beryl is persuaded to go. He opens the front door and lets himself in. Following the sound of voices, Neil sees Trenwyck and Gorsline and overhears the talk that a woman is made a prisoner. Positive that it is Beryl, he demands to know where she is, and with the refusal to tell there is a hand-to-hand struggle, in which Neil overpowers Gorsline, who admits she is in the library. Neil, entering, finds it vacant. Again in the street, he is pushed into a group crowded around a van piled with trunks, one of which is Berdyne's. The toppling of a brick wall breaks the trunk open and among the scattered papers is a charred bundle marked "Papers Concerning the Grayson Affair," and knowing their value, he hastens to the home of his cousin Arthur Preston of Nob Hill, where they can be safely guarded. At the same hour Beryl and Tonita go to Nob Hill hoping to find Neil. His mother, recognizing Beryl, requests Arthur to prevent Neil from meeting her. She accuses Beryl of intrigue in winning Neil, and to prove her relation with him Beryl produces her marriage certificate. Mrs. Preston, dumbfounded and anxious to mislead Beryl, infers that Neil is on his way to Denver. The next morning Arthur hurriedly awakens Neil. The fire is upon them, the house doomed, and making preparations to leave, Neil encounters his mother, who admits her knowledge of his marriage and with his refusal to go with them and not desert his wife, his mother hopes never to see his face again.

CHAPTER XXIV.

PURSUED!

NOT until the two girls reached the walk outside the stately home of Arthur Preston did the emotions which poor Beryl had so bravely held in check while under the eyes of Neil's arrogant mother find vent. Tears brimmed from her eyes and fell over her soft cheek. She staggered, too, as though her strength had gone suddenly from her.

"Oh, my darling!" breathed the Mexicana tenderly, "only to think that there could be such people in the world! That woman acted," added Tonita fiercely, "as though we were not good enough for her to wipe her shoes on. I hate her!" and she turned and shook her clenched brown hand toward the house.

The flickering flames from the portable stoves beat luridly about Tonita, bringing out her graceful, defiant form like a clear-cut cameo against the gloom of the street.

"Hush, dearest, hush!" murmured Beryl brokenly. "Let us not forget that she is my darling Neil's mother."

"For all that," cried Tonita, "she is a heartless wretch! I shall hate her always. Then think what she said about the Senor Preston!"

"That was false!" said Beryl, with sweet confidence. "Neil would never forsake me; he would never leave me alone in this great, desolated city. He is searching for me, and will continue to do so until we find each other and come into our happiness."

Beryl's grief and sadness fled, for her trust in her lover brought an all-pervading calm to her troubled breast.

Suddenly, with a muttered exclamation of alarm, Beryl seized Tonita's hand and drew her down in the deep shadow of the inclosing wall.

"What is it?" asked the surprised Mexicana. "What caused you——"

Beryl placed her little hand over her friend's lips and pointed. A man was coming along the sidewalk, walking hurriedly among the huddled refugees. He passed so close to the girls that they could have reached out and touched him. The light from the stoves shone in his face, and Beryl and Tonita could see him turn from the walk and climb the broad steps to the door of the Preston mansion.

"Trenwyck!" Beryl quiveringly gasped in Tonita's ear. "It is the wicked lawyer Irma Lee told me about—Berdyne's confederate—the man who lured me into the deserted house where we found Gorsline. Oh, if he had seen us! Come quickly, Tonita; let us fly from here and escape him."

Trembling with terror, but with strength inspired by her very fears, Beryl arose and started along the walk. Tonita, calmer and more collected, supported her as they hurried. At almost every corner they turned. The roar of the flames, the frightful pall of smoke in the sky, the desultory booming of distant dynamite, all conspired to unnerve poor Beryl, now that she had caught a glimpse of the lawyer's evil face.

"Courage, querida," said Tonita reassuringly. "You must stop and rest, for you can hardly drag yourself along."

"But we are followed! That wretched lawyer is behind us."

"I do not think so, dearest."

"They told him at Arthur Preston's that we had been there!" went on Beryl wildly; "they have put him on our track, knowing he is an agent of Berdyne's! They would do anything, anything, to have harm happen to me. Ah, was ever a poor girl so persecuted?"

But Beryl's fictitious strength was waning fast. She staggered, and Tonita drew her tenderly to the side of some steps by which they were passing. While they crouched there, the Mexicana clasping her friend to her breast, Trenwyck came hurrying along, staring straight ahead. In a few moments he vanished. Beryl could not see him, as her eyes were hidden, but she heard the quick, eager step.

"Is it—is it Trenwyck?" she murmured.

"No, querida," whispered Tonita, speaking deliberately, in order to spare her friend. "You have nothing more to fear now. Your Tonita would not let any harm come to you."

They rested a little while longer; then they got up, and the Mexicana, guiding her friend, started in a direction opposite to that taken by the lawyer. Tonita herself was very weary, and a return to Russian Hill was out of the question. They must find some nearer refuge for the night.

Presently they came out upon an open space, gleaming with white tents, and they could see soldiers patrolling back and forth.

"Halt!" cried a stern voice as the two girls approached the encampment.

The poor wanderers halted, and the soldier who had challenged them came close and stared into their faces. The flickering, sullen light from the fire banners that waved over the city fell on the two fair faces, and the soldier marveled at their beauty.

"Sir," appealed Beryl, recalling the kindness of the other soldier she had met, and feeling that she and Tonita were near one who would befriend them, "we are very tired, and have no place where we can stay for the night. Our friends are at Russian Hill, but we do not feel able to walk so far."

"You ought to be with your friends," said the boy in blue, "but I can find a place for you in a tent where there are some other women. Come this way."

He led them in among the army tents, halted at one, stepped back, and waved them in.

"You will be safe here," said he kindly, "for the park is patrolled on all four sides. If any one should seek to molest you, you have only to cry out, and assistance will come."

They thanked the guard and crept into the tent. There were others there, farther back in the gloom. A woman's voice called:

"Anna, is it you? My daughter, my little daughter!"

"We are two homeless girls, madam," answered Beryl.

A wail of disappointment came from the woman.

"I was asleep and dreaming, dreaming that my lost child had been restored to me," cried the woman. "We were separated, and I wonder if we shall ever meet again in this life!"

The moaning voice subsided into a sort of dumb despair. In a few moments the soldier returned and passed something into the tent.

"Here are two blankets," said he; "I got them for you out of a couple of our blanket rolls."

Again they thanked him for his thoughtfulness, and made themselves as comfortable as they could on the hard ground. Beryl soon fell into sound slumber; but Tonita, worried because she knew Trenwyck had followed them so successfully from the Preston mansion, could not sleep.

The flickering light of the great conflagration beat upon the outer walls of the tent; and in this light, reflected on the canvas, she saw a figure—a man's shadow. Her heart leaped into her throat and almost choked her. The shadow moved stealthily along the tent wall, pausing again and again. Several times the frightened girl was on the point of crying out, but each time she smothered her fears, not wishing to disturb Beryl.

Could that shadow be cast by the form of Trenwyck? Had he succeeded in following them, even there? If so, how had he got through the cordon drawn about the encampment by the soldiers?

Presently the shadow left the tent wall and hovered around the end of the structure. Silently as a gliding serpent it approached the opening. Then, just as a wild scream was on Tonita's lips, a vigilant guard shouted:

"Come out of there! Come out, I say, or I'll fire!"

A muttered imprecation struck on the girl's ears. The form started to run, and the sodden report of a rifle echoed out. No cry followed the shot—merely the hurry of running feet, dying away into silence.

No one in the camp seemed to have been aroused; certainly no one in the tent took notice of the shot, other than Tonita. The other occupants slept peacefully on, and Beryl slumbered dreamlessly in her friend's arms.

Tonita was reassured. Certainly the wretched, homeless people were vigilantly guarded by those brave soldier boys. As the Mexicana's fears gradually passed away, sleep came to her own tired eyes.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE TOTTERING WALL.

Beryl started out of her refreshing slumber into the light of morning. She sat up, bewildered and confused, grappling with the mystery of her presence in the tent, wondering at the babel of sound that reached her from without, trying to piece together the links in that dread chain of events.

At last a wave of recollection rolled over her. She remembered the visit to the stately home on Nob Hill, the pursuit by Trenwyck, the kindness of the soldier, and the refuge to which he had led her and Tonita.

Beryl turned to speak to her friend, but found the tent empty, save for herself. Tossed, disordered blankets covered the ground, but Beryl was the only one in that rude shelter. A pang of fear shot through her heart.

"Tonita! Tonita!" she called, struggling to her feet and out into the open.

Wretched people were all around her, many of them but half clad, and some wearing the poorest of garments. The heaps of luggage, with which she was already so familiar, were to be seen in every conceivable place. Sewing machines, dressers, chairs, trunks formed the nucleus of each poor heap of belongings, and among these the old and young, the delicate woman and the strong man, were sitting and eating the rations distributed by the government.

The morning light was darkened by the smoke pall. The sun could only be seen at intervals when it broke, like a ghostly, blood-red ball, through the awesome haze. Already the fire had touched that part of the city—lightly, however, for the demon had been fought with dynamite and with some success.

Across from the small park, and half a block below, was the great, tottering front wall of an apartment house. Back of the wall was only a mass of smouldering ruins, and the wall itself swayed back and forth with a wavy motion, threatening to fall at any moment. It might drop into the street, or inward upon its own foundations. The ever-present soldiers patrolled each end of the block to warn people away.

Beryl gazed with awe at the great, fluttering mass of masonry, then turned to observe another spectacle of a different sort. A huge army wagon was drawn up at one side of the square. On the seat with the driver sat an officer with a drawn revolver; on the ground, beside the wagon, stretched a file of men and women with baskets and pitchers, receiving water and food from men in the rear of the wagon.

A cry of joy escaped Beryl's lips when she recognized Tonita in the line, waiting to receive her own portion of fare. The Mexicana, gazing toward her friend, waved one hand encouragingly.

In a little while Tonita had received her store of water and food, and came hastily back to her friend.

"See, darling!" she cried, displayng a cracked pitcher half full of water and a tin dish containing bread and canned meat, "a woman loaned me the pitcher and the basin, and the good soldiers have supplied us with our breakfast. We shall do very well indeed, querida. A sound night's rest and a morning meal will make us feel like different persons."

"You are always thoughtful, Tonita," said Beryl gratefully. "It must have tired you to stand so long in line. Why did you not wake me?"

"I felt that you should have all the rest that you could get, dearest," answered the unselfish Mexicana, setting the food and water on the trampled grass. "Come; sit before me, and I will comb that bonny golden hair of yours with one of my side combs, and we will do what little we may to make ourselves presentable."

Something of the Mexicana's enforced gayety was imparted to her friend, and soon they were eating their rude fare with a hearty relish.

"Do you know what I have heard this morning, dear?" queried Tonita, sadness creeping into her voice. "Stanford University has been wrecked and ruined; and Manuel, my faithful caballero, I do not know whether he escaped or not."

"My dearest Tonita!" murmured Beryl sympathetically. "And you can be so brave even with that fearful uncertainty before you."

"'Tis better to keep up a good heart, darling," returned the girl, albeit her lips quivered as she spoke the cheerful words. Then, as they finished their meal and drew away, she sang softly:

"Oh, sing the song we loved, love,
When all life seemed one song;
For life is none too long, love——"

The words died away on her soft lips, and she turned her face that Beryl might not see her gathering tears. Silently, sympathetically, Beryl clasped her friend's hand. Their hearts went out to each other, in that sad, lonely moment, as never before.

"Let us not give way," said Tonita bravely, drying her eyes. "Our own trials and misfortunes seem so insignificant when compared with the woe that has fallen upon so many. All Santa Clara Valley, I heard, has suffered from the earthquake. Not so much as San Francisco, for here the fire is adding its horrors; but, where there is so much sorrow, why should we not be like so many others, and bear up with a good spirit? The saints will protect and defend us, and, if it is their will, we shall meet our loved ones again."

While they sat talking, they were brought to their feet by a shout from one of the soldiers on guard before the swaying wall of the burned apartment house. As the two girls could see, being in the rank of refugees nearest to that side of the park, an automobile had rushed out into the street, heading into the danger that threatened from the swaying masonry. There were two persons in the automobile—a man on the front seat and a woman on the seat behind. Trunks and satchels were piled about them.

"Why!" cried Beryl, quick to recognize the two figures in the automobile, "one of them is—is——"

"One of them," spoke up Tonita cuttingly, "is the cruel woman we met last evening. She has been obliged to flee, like the rest of us. What good is her money to her now? They will not get far in that vehicle, for the soldiers will take it away from them. Ah, I love to see the pride of such people humbled!"

Tonita's fiery words were unheeded by her friend. Beryl, gazing as though spellbound, watched Arthur Preston continue his onward dash in disregard of the soldier's warning that he was going into peril. Perhaps the man in the automobile did not understand: in view of what quickly happened, it would seem that the meaning of the soldier's words had not been understood.

"Look!" whispered Beryl, running forward a few steps in her excitement. "There is another automobile with soldiers coming from around the corner.

A warning was called to the second car. "Red Cross!" flung back the driver of that machine, and the soldiers fell back, merely pointing toward the tottering wall.

A collision between the two cars, coming from opposite directions, and with the menacing wall between them, seemed inevitable. A deep silence settled over the people who were watching. Not a cry went up because of a threatened calamity; every beholding eye had looked upon so many accidents that it had become inured to such spectacles.

A shout went up from the driver of the Red Cross car, when, doubling around the corner of the wall, he saw the other vehicle approaching. The driver of each car flung himself desperately upon the steering wheel. Presence of mind averted a head-on collision, the Red Cross automobile scurrying across the front of the Preston car; but the front wheels of the latter machine jolted heavily against the rear wheels of the former. There was merely a tremendous jar, and the cars rushed onward.

"The wall! The wall!" shouted the men in the Red Cross car.

Arthur Preston gazed up at the tottering mass lowering over him. The wall had stood there for hours, swaying on its foundations; would it, by some uncanny working of fate, fall in that supreme moment?

Then, while all eyes appeared to be following the rapidly separating automobiles, Beryl saw something that had apparently escaped the other. Mrs. Preston had been thrown from her seat,

What Other Cereal

Do You Know that Folks Like Half So Well?

There are many cereal dainties. But what other is so welcome as a Puffed Grain to a child?

Here are flimsy, toasted bubbles, with a taste like toasted nuts. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size. They crush at a touch, then melt away to almond-flavored granules. No one ever gets enough.

Yet here are whole grains with whole grain nutrition. Here are hygienic, all-hour foods—the best-cooked grain foods in existence. Do you often serve a lesser food to people who want these?

So like nut meats that people use Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs as garnish on ice cream.

They crisp and douse them with melted butter for children to eat like peanuts when at play.

And in candy

Girls use Puffed Rice in place of nut meats in home candy making. And it makes the candy light.

Any Puffed Grain makes ideal toasted wafers for a soup.

Grains Puffed to Bubbles

Every Food Cell Blasted—Easy to Digest

Prof. A. P. Anderson, the food expert, invented the Puffed Grain process.

Ordinary cooking breaks some food cells, but not all. His object was to break all food cells so the whole grain would digest.

Every food element would then be available, and every atom feed.

Shot from guns

The grains are sealed in guns, then revolved for an hour in 550 degrees of heat. The trifle of moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

When the guns are shot the steam explodes. Every food cell is broken, so digestion is easy and complete.

100 million explosions

A grain of wheat contains over 100 million food cells. So 100 million separate explosions occur in every kernel.

There are 16 elements in wheat. All of them, in this way, become available as food. The kernel becomes a bubble, airy, flaky, crisp. And the fearful heat gives it the nut-like flavor.

Delightful Dishes

Puffed Wheat in milk forms the ideal supper dish. And it does not tax digestion.

In the morning, any Puffed Grain with cream and sugar is a fascinating dish. Or serve with melted butter.

Mixed with fruit, these thin, crisp morsels make a perfect blend. They add what crust adds to a shortcake or to pie.

For hungry children after school, crisp a Puffed grain and lightly douse with butter. This makes them food confections.

Each Puffed Grain has a different flavor, each its own delights. Keep all three kinds on hand. Let the children eat them as they like them, as often as they will. There is nothing better than a whole grain made a tidbit in this way.

Flour that makes pancakes seem made from nuts

After hundreds of tests, our experts have made the ideal pancake mixture, and it includes ground Puffed Rice. The Puffed Rice flour, with its blasted cells, makes the pancakes fluffy. And it gives a nut-like taste. The flour is self-raising. Simply add milk or water and it makes the finest pancakes ever tasted. Try it.

Cubby Bear and the Bird Concert

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

BILLY Bluejay, Redtop Woodpecker and Wise Owl were talking together earnestly one day in early spring, when Cubby Bear came upon them.

"Shall we tell Cubby about it?" asked Redtop.

"Yes," answered Wise Owl, "I have about decided to invite all the animals (excepting Sammie Skunk, of course); that is, all who will promise to be good, and not frighten the birds who are strangers."

"Oh, what do you mean?" asked Cubby, interested at once.

"It is spring," said Billy Bluejay, "and we birds who stay in the north all winter are planning on a real jubilee when all the other birds have come back from the south. We shall make ourselves a welcoming committee, meet them as they come, one by one, and invite them to help in our concert, which we shall give as soon as everyone is here."

"Shinyblack Crow has been here for some time," said Cubby Bear, "and only a few days ago I saw Robbie Reddie."

"Yes, and I saw a wedge-shaped flock of wild geese flying wild overhead this morning," said Redtop, "but they would not be a help in our concert."

Chirpy Chipmunk joined the group, and was told about the birds' plan.

"That is good!" said little Chirpy. "I wish I might do something to help."

"Oh, this is to be a birds' affair," said Wise Owl. "We do not need your help, but you may be one of the audience. We mean to have some distinguished guests here if they will come. Robbie Reddie has promised to look them up, and invite them as politely as possible."

"Who will they be?" asked Cubby.

"Mr. and Mrs. Cardinal, and if possible the Mocking-bird, though he seldom comes as far north as this. He would not dare to be caught in a storm here, even in May, for fear that his throat might be injured, and spoil his wonderful voice."

"Be sure to let me know when the concert is to be," said Cubby. "I would not want to miss it."

"I shall write the invitations on white birch bark, and send them around as soon as we decide on the day," Wise Owl promised.

A few days later Chirpy Chipmunk came to Mamma Bruin's house, brimming over with excitement. "Oh, Cubby Bear!" he cried, "I have thought of a way to help the birds with their concert! Come and help me find Wise Owl, so I can tell him."

They started at once.

"What can you do?" asked Cubby.

"Why, there must be a banquet, of course," said Chirpy. "The birds will want something nice to eat after giving their concert. And there is not much to be found now, so early in the season, to feed all their fine guests."

"That is so," agreed Cubby.

"Last fall," Chirpy hurried on, "I laid in a large store of food, more than I ever had before—more than I could eat—and my underground storerooms still hold quantities of seeds and grain, which the birds would like. I will give them, and you shall help pass them around, if Wise Owl says we may."

"Oh, that is good of you!" said Cubby admiringly. "Racky Coon has a nice basket, and I am sure he will lend it to us to hold the things."

As they drew near to Wise Owl's hollow tree, they heard a noise which puzzled them.

"There is Redtop Woodpecker," said Chirpy. "We will ask him what it is."

"Why, that," explained Redtop, "is our jazz band. I don't like it myself, but Wise Owl says it is very stylish, so we must have it. I only hope it will not drive our audience away."

"But what bird could make a noise like that?" asked Cubby, listening to the harsh, discordant sounds.

"No one bird could," said Redtop; "it is a dozen or more Purple Grackles. They are rehearsing for the concert."

The birds were delighted with little Chirpy's offer, and were loud in their thanks.

"We will give you a seat of honor at the concert," they told him. "You and Cubby Bear, who will help you to serve the refreshments. You remember the great willow tree, with wide-spreading branches, which grows by the Big Brook, a mile or so below here? Well, that is where we shall give the concert. There is one great, broad branch which we shall use for the stage. We plan to have the animals down on the ground, but you and Cubby shall be up in the tree, with the birds."

Cubby and Chirpy hurried back home to tell Mamma Bruin the glad news.

Rehearsals went gaily on, filling the Pleasant Forest with bird songs through all the mild spring weather, and at last, on a morning in May, came the grand concert.

All roads through the forest led, that morning, to the great willow tree, whose leaves were now a tender, beautiful green; and birds and animals of every sort flocked to the spot.

Cubby Bear, his face one broad smile of happiness, sat on a bough of the tree which reached across Big Brook. He balanced carefully beside him Racky Coon's prettiest basket, filled with the good things Chirpy Chipmunk had provided, and little Chirpy was perched on the other side of the basket, his tawny tail rising like a plume behind him.

Shinyblack Crow, every feather preened and glossy, flew here and there, calling the birds together with his loud "Caw, caw!"

Mr. Wise Owl stood silently on a limb of the willow, sedate and dignified, staring through his colored glasses at the gathering throng.

The animals were seated on the ground and on logs and stones, eager for the concert to begin. Some of them looked up enviously at Cubby Bear and Chirpy Chipmunk in the tree.

The Purple Grackles' jazz band was the opening number on the program. "If we must have it," Redtop Woodpecker had said, "let it come first, to be over with the sooner!" Their creaky, grating cries were not musical, but the noise was loud enough to be heard a long distance, and call any belated straggler to the scene.

CUBBY BEAR, HIS FACE ONE BROAD SMILE OF HAPPINESS, SAT ON A BOUGH OF THE TREE.

Robbie Reddie, his red vest glowing in the sunlight, carrolled a springtime song in his own joyous fashion.

Then the whisper went around, "Mr. and Mrs. Cardinal are coming!"

Shinyblack Crow appeared, sailing along on his broad wings, and after him came the distinguished visitors.

Mr. Cardinal was a large bird, grand enough in manner, and gorgeous enough in color to impress all who saw him with wonder. Mrs. Cardinal was less showy than her husband, and quietly took the place shown her in the tree, seeming not to expect any notice. But Mr. Cardinal, not waiting to be announced, took his stand in the center of the stage, and, head held high, poured forth his strong, rich whistle, "Cheo, cheo, cheo!" over and over and over. Of course with such a brilliant prelude, a wonderful song was expected, but "Cheo, cheo!" was all Mr. Cardinal could sing. However, he was much applauded.

The Hermit Thrush, a shy bird, would not come in sight of his listeners, but gave a song of wonderful sweetness from a shady thicket.

The Yellow Warbler warbled sweetly, and all the other warblers joined him in a rollicking chorus. Blue-winged Warbler, Hooded Warbler, Magnolia Warbler, and others of their cousins were there, gaily dressed, and showing a surprising variety of colors.

Little Chickadee Chirrupee gave an acrobatic performance, swinging head downward from a twig of the willow tree, and showing skill and daring in many odd performances.

Next, the Nuthatch ran head-first down the tree trunk, going with wonderful swiftness, yet never missing his foothold; while at the same time the Brown Creeper climbed rapidly up the tree, circling around and around in dizzying spirals.

The Song Sparrow's name was down on the program for each of his fourteen different songs. Some of the audience grew restless seeing him come forward so many times, but his cousins, English Sparrow, Vesper Sparrow, Chipping Sparrow and all the others, listened admiringly and applauded their relative with shrill chirpings.

Bluebird, Meadow Lark, Goldfinch, Bobolink, Purple Finch and Brown Thrasher delighted everyone with their sweet melodies.

The Scarlet Tanager, too, was a pleasing songster, but Chirpy whispered to Cubby Bear, "I like our own Robbie Reddie better."

At the conclusion of the concert, the Catbird flew to the stage, though he had not been invited to sing.

"Shoo him away!" said Wise Owl indignantly to Shinyblack Crow.

"No," answered Shinyblack, "let us see what he means to do. He can mimic them all."

The Catbird gave a few dismal squakings, like a frightened kitten.

"What's he trying to do, any way? With a voice like that!" exclaimed Scarlet Tanager, with a flirt of his wings.

Then Catbird whistled clearly, "Cheo, cheo, cheo!"

Mr. Cardinal looked around for another Cardinal bird, but decided the call was made by this sober-coated Catbird.

Ready for action now, Catbird raised his head, opened his bill, and poured from his slender throat a most surprising burst of melody. Every warble, chant, carol, chirp, purl, quaver, trill, and twitter that had gone before, were in his song—a perfect repetition of the whole concert.

Then such a cheering followed as had not been heard before.

"We do not care now that the southern Mocking-bird could not be here today," said Shinyblack Crow. "Our northern Catbird is all we need."

"I never heard him sing like that before," was heard on all sides.

Cubby Bear had been listening in wonder to the Catbird's song, and when it was finished clapped his paws and laughed in joyous applause, quite forgetting for the moment the basket he had been so carefully guarding.

It rocked, slid and fell.

A shriek from Chirpy Chipmunk made Cubby look around.

Making a lunge to catch at the falling basket, Cubby, too, lost his balance, and followed the basket into the cold waters of Big Brook, which were swollen with springtime rains and melting snow.

He made a tremendous splash, then scrambling to his feet, dashed after the basket, which was already floating away.

Alas, the basket had turned upside down in falling, and the birds' banquet, which little Chirpy had so generously given from his storehouse, was hopelessly scattered.

The animals crowded the banks, dismay on every face. Some of the birds flew down and rescued a seed here and there.

Poor Chirpy wept openly.

There was no banquet left to serve. "And with the grand Cardinals here, too!" mourned Redtop Woodpecker.

Poor Cubby Bear was covered with confusion and distress. He had been so happy, and now everybody would blame him for spoiling the whole affair. He crawled up on the bank, and shook the cold water from his coat.

"I am sorry!" he said sadly.

Then little Chickadee Chirrupee came forward with an announcement to make, and the day was saved.

"Chickadee, dee, dee, dee!
Come, listen to me,"

he called. "I can tell you of a place where a feast is always spread, ready for any bird, for all the birds, to eat freely. I have had no hungry days through the past winter. If you will wait for just a little while, I will go quickly and see if enough is there now for our concert singers and visitors."

He darted away, his little black cap headed toward the farm.

"Do you know what he means?" Wise Owl asked Redtop Woodpecker.

"No," was the answer, but Billy Bluejay said, "I do. I have feasted there many a day myself. The farm children made a feeding table for the birds near the house, and all the winter and spring have kept it covered with bits of suet, grain and crumbs."

They had not long to wait for Chickadee's return.

"Yes, yes," he said. "All is ready; follow me. The table is covered with good things to eat, and the children were watching me from a window. How glad they will be to see so many of us! If there is not enough food for all of us, they will bring more. They like to have us come, for they know we are a help to the farmer, destroying so many insects that spoil the flowers, and fruits and vegetables. And after we have had our feast, we can pay them for their kindness by giving another concert."

CONDUCTED BY UNCLE CHARLIE

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome.
ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

THE League of Woman Voters which met in Chicago last February passed two resolutions, both of which vitally affect the future of this nation and one of which vitally affects all humanity. The first resolution was in favor of the League of Nations, which has been approved by 18,000 ministers and numerous other organizations working for peace and world betterment. The second was a determined opposition to any sort of universal military training. The position the women took on these matters showed a woeful lack of vision and sound common sense, for they can't have a League of Nations, which, for years at least, will have to deal with problems bristling with racial dynamite and national discords, unless they have military power to enforce the League's mandates. Do they expect the sons of European mothers, of nations already bled white and practically bankrupt, to do all the enforcing and fighting, while they coddle their sons and revel in that brand of fool pacifism which always reacts with terrible effect on the puerile dreamers who indulge in it? We get nothing in this world by merely wishing for it. If we want universal peace, we must work for it, if necessary, fight for it. Life is a struggle and the more we struggle the more we shall grow and achieve, and only by growth and achievement shall we reach the goal of universal fraternity, peace and good-will.

I know you are heart and soul behind every effort to do to old King War what you have done to old King Booze. You'd like to put them both in the same grave and so would I. Time and again men have attempted by leagues and alliances to preserve peace and so far have failed. Some pinheads take the stand that because history is strewn with the wrecks of these leagues and alliances, we should make no more effort in that direction. But there is one saving and divine grace in the natures of all who are human beings and not beans, and that is that failure in a good cause (and I take it for granted there is no greater or more sublime cause than keeping peace and preserving mankind and womankind from the horrors, miseries and deviltries of war) only spurs men to renewed effort. Look how long you women took to get a vote, and think how many years it took you to down old King Booze, but you did it. Now you have another and more terrific fight, and you will not quit until the hell hounds of war are also laid in the dust. It is not in God's purpose that we shall quit until war is banished from the earth. We must face this thing, not in any petty, partizan or fool pacifist spirit, but with the zeal of the crusader, and give the democratic, peace-loving nations of the earth our moral support (and if civilization was threatened as it recently was, possibly something more substantial) until war, which is hell, is driven forever from this planet. It is a big order, but what the men can't or won't do, the women will.

There is one vital fact that those who write about this and all other similar efforts to preserve world peace entirely overlook. Man has progressed along scientific and inventive lines to such an extraordinary degree that he has become, in all material things, a very giant, and a very dangerous giant at that. The spiritual side of man's nature has not, except in a very small degree, begun to keep pace with the material. Thus one half of man is over-developed, the other half, atrophied by millions of years of bloodshed, greed, animalism and selfishness, is undeveloped. Thus we have not a real man as God would have men be, but a human flivver running on two wheels instead of four. Man is lopsided and must go into dry-dock and have his cargo trimmed and be put on an even keel, otherwise the material and murderous side of him will destroy the spiritual and he will perish by his own hands, fall a victim to the terrible and terrific forces his marvelous but badly-balanced genius have unleashed. Man has developed more scientifically and materially in the last thirty years than in all the millions of years he has inhabited this planet. Spiritually, however, he has advanced but little. Only in war does he show by his heroism and sacrifice the grandeur and greatness that is in him. But directly war is over and the fever of battle is passed, our hero flops back into his old ruts of selfishness and ugliness and thus bears out the contention of the cynic that a hero in war is a jackass in peace.

Now we cannot afford to fill the world full of blood and agony to give men a chance to die heroically. What we want them to do is to live heroically at all times; and, too, we cannot afford to turn the world over to human jackasses or permit the genius of the few to be used for the destruction of the many. Man will keep on warring and killing until he is humanized and civilized by the spiritual forces of society and it is you good women, who largely control those forces, who must put them into effect or mankind will perish from the earth. You will say man never had a chance. Man has had chances, many of them, but dread, fear, suspicion and false counsel have always switched him onto the wrong track and off he has gone with bleeding feet up another blind alley, learning nothing from the bitter experience of thousands of years of misery and suffering. The time has come, however, when man will no longer permit the timid to scare him, the heartless to bleed him, or the unscrupulous to mislead him. The finger of Time points to the broad Highway of Peace. The blind alleys of war and despair must be closed forever and it is you women who suffer most from war who have a right to demand that it shall cease. Science has annihilated space. If you doubt this, note that the Atlantic has been crossed in a few hours and that four men in an airplane have flown from England to Australia, and man has made the world so small that we can't move without falling over each other. There is no isolated spot to which decent folk can retire when the dogs of war are unchained, and live in peace and security. Do not be lulled by Atlantic and Pacific Oceans into any sense of false security, for, though these oceans exist on the map, science has demolished them and we are today, for good or ill, whether we like it or not, one big and very quarrelsome family, and means have got to be devised for keeping the family in order so that its decent members can live out their lives in peace and be protected from the turbulent and lawless. The old world is a thing of the past and the standpatters and reactionaries cannot resurrect it. Now it is up to you to decide what kind of a world this is to be. It will not be a better, but an infinitely worse world, unless you use all the power at your command to spiritualize it and keep it clean and wholesome. Remember, we have outgrown old methods and old ways of doing things. If no effort is to be made to end big wars first and all wars later, then why live at all? For with the menace of war ever hovering over us and every war breeding new forms of plague and pestilence, what, I say, is the good of it all? And why should we submit and ask our children and children's children to submit to all these horrors when it is in our power to stop this reign of Satan and let the Christ come in?

But if your new world is to be a success you must be intensely practical as well as idealistic. You've got to see the coal hole at your feet or you will never reach the mountain peaks beyond. All sorts of traps will be placed in your path, every means devised to scare you, and you will have to suffer and endure before you will have the world you want. We rejoice in the Christmas covers we see on our magazines and prattle about peace on earth, good-will to men, Glory to God in the Highest, etc., then we plan to surround ourselves and country with a stone fence of selfishness, crawl into a hole like a prairie dog and by that act admit that our belief in a God and Jesus Christ His Son, the Prince of Peace, was all humbug and hypocrisy.

We cannot, however, rear a temple of peace on a foundation of piffling pacifism and sloppy sentimentality. We must be ready to fight for peace with the same grim determination that we wage war. Now how can we have peace? Never by hog isolation. We have all got to get together and talk things over and even if selfish and conflicting interests cause contention and bad feeling, we must still stick together, and after a time we shall get to know each other better, for the trouble with men is not so much that their interests differ as that they lack the desire to understand and know each other. With understanding and knowledge, contention and strife will gradually disappear, friction will wear smooth the rough edges of our high and noble purpose, and then some day when cant, fear, hate, hypocrisy and selfishness are buried, men, gathered from all parts of the earth round the council table of the nations, will grasp each other's hands, look into each other's eyes and say: "Brother, what in thunder have we been fighting and scrapping for all through the ages? God did not want us to do it; it broke His heart to see us do it. Now, thank Heaven, the horrors of the bloody past are forever over and together we can walk the paths of universal fraternity in peace and content."

This is the end for which you must strive, this is the ideal you must cherish in your bosoms no matter how distant the goal or how hard the road. But to get rid of the devil, you have got to use some of the tools of the devil. It is paradoxical, but none the less true, that you cannot have peace as conditions are at present, unless you are willing to fight for it. That is why you have policemen in your city and all the machinery of the law to protect you. Without that protection, your homes would be raided and your lives snuffed out. So if you want a United States safe and secure from invasion and insist on an association of nations or something similar to the Hague Conference, which failed because it had no teeth, just as your dog would fail to scare away the tramps if he were toothless, you've got to have force behind it. Not aggressive, imperialistic force but the force of righteousness, for force is the only thing that the lawless respect. It was the utter lack of any real military force in Great Britain and the U. S. that emboldened the Kaiser to embark on his mad scheme of world conquest. It was the efforts of fool pacifists in the late war that came within an ace of wrecking civilization and handing us over to the military despotism of Prussia. We have taught men that it pays to be sober; we must get together and make the world realize that it pays to be peaceful, and then the nations won't need a universal policeman to make them behave. Humanity has come to the parting of the ways, has come to that point where it must forever stand armed to the teeth and confess that it is a vile, hateful thing, or follow in the footsteps of the Savior and be really humane and truly Christlike. In this period of reconstruction, which will last for a considerable time, we must be prepared for all emergencies. We cannot have what we seek by being either fool pacifists or brutal militarists, but we can have what we want if we recognize our obligations to our country and to mankind; realize that owing to our great heritage of wealth and strength we must bear our share of the burdens of our common humanity. If you did not want to undertake those burdens, then you had no right, you good women, to vote for any League of Nations, for those who enter into Leagues must be prepared, if they want them to function and usher in the peaceful world they dream of, to be ready to sacrifice and, if necessary, die for their principles and ideals. Weakness invites aggression, strength repels it. Only as you are strong can you accomplish anything. Youth must have discipline and learn to respect authority, and neither of these fundamental principles of right living and good citizenship are instilled into the minds of our youth today, either in the home or in school. Hence, hog selfishness, crime, indifference to the public weal, lax morals or no morals at all, abound and love of luxury, pleasure, ease and hatred of work and contempt for law threaten our whole national fabric with ruin and decay.

Thousands of American mothers are breaking their hearts today because fifty thousand of their sons perished during the late war, and they perished because many of these same mothers did not believe in preparedness. Fifty per cent of the men who were enlisted during the late war, after seeing a little service in the draft battalions were pronounced physically unfit and were not available for military duty. Here are Senator Chamberlain's seven economic and social reasons for the adoption of universal military training, which should not be called training for war but training for citizenship, manhood and fatherhood: (1) Physical and consequently mental development, because there can be no strong mind in a physically defective body. (2) Discipline, very much needed in this day and generation. (3) The inculcation of patriotism and the love of the flag. (4) The Americanization of the different elements which compose American life. (5) Democratization of our youth, making the rich and poor learn, shoulder to shoulder, to perform our country's service when needed. (6) Vocational training fitting the man to do the things for which he finds himself best fitted. (7) Teaching the laws of hygiene and sanitation so that the young man when he is called into service or engaged in peaceful pursuits knows how to protect himself against the ravages of disease. The only trouble is we have not at present got the money to put this splendid project through, but you will never have a healthy, worth-while nation until it is put through. The American Legion says it is deeply impressed with the folly of national unpreparedness, from the results of which it suffered terribly while in France. If you do not realize the sacrifices involved and the magnitude of the task you have undertaken in attempting to wage war on war, and if you haven't a fighting as well as a prayerful spirit and an indomitable will, then this is no job for you. Remember, I have nothing to say for or against this present League of Nations. It was a league of nations and not any special nation that won the late war, and whether this League is thrown into the discard or not matters not a jot, for something similar or better will soon replace it, for humanity is determined that war must go, for it realizes that unless war goes man must. There isn't room for both, man and Mars (the god of war) upon this planet.

The one thing that fills my weary soul with joy is that you women have made up your minds that war has got to go just as booze has got to go. Every scheme that is invented to make it go, however, will meet with ferocious opposition by those reactionaries who see in every effort to better conditions, evils and dangers that exist in stage-coach minds that can only look backward. But the backward trail is a trail of blood and most men and nearly all women are agreed that that trail shall be trodden no longer, for a few more steps on that loathsome path will plunge us all over the precipice of eternal ruin. So go ahead, you good women, and fight the hell hounds of war unto the death; fight them, if necessary, with their own weapons, and may the Lord God of Hosts be with you and give you victory.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

BLUFORD, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a brown eyed, brown haired girl of sixteen. In summer I live on a farm but in the winter I stay in town to be close to school. I've been separated from my parents for over eight years and do not know whether they are living or not. I am living with a fine family but of course it is not like being with one's own folks. I had two brothers in the war but don't know if they returned home or not. I am in the eighth grade and hope to graduate from the common school this winter. I have always had the ambition to travel, but never knew how I could manage it. What do you think about the acts of Mexico in kidnapping our agents? I think they had better look out or they will get what they need. I would be glad to have the cousins write me.

Lovingly your niece and cousin, EVA WILKERSON.

Eva, I hope some day you will find your parents. It seems to me that something must have happened to them, otherwise they would have found you. You are lucky to be living with a fine family and I advise you to stick to them. What is the matter with your brothers that they do not communicate with you or you with them? If your brothers are as bright and write as well as you do, it seems to me they are missing a whole lot of pleasure and must be strangely lacking in natural affection or they would keep in touch with you. As regards your ambition to travel, let me advise you, if you are wise, to stay right at home where you can get free board and free eats and free clothes. If, however, the wanderlust has got the best of you and you want to indulge in the joyous abandon of bumping the bumps over our broken-down railroads, just save up a thousand dollars, buy a ticket for the nearest town, which will cost you about half of your thousand, and then, hungry, sore, travel-stained and weary, go into a restaurant when you get to your destination, and order a bowl of soup and that will use up the other five hundred. Then with a sad heart and sore feet you can hit the trail for home. That will cure you of your wanderlust. Eva, I cannot thrash out the Mexican question in the limited space at my disposal, but I may say that the acts of Mexico are not quite so exalted or spiritually inspiring as the Acts of the Apostles. You say "the Mexicans had better look out or they will get what they need." Of course, what they need, and what most of us need, is civilization and education. What, however, a good many of them want, or at least those who live in the neighborhood of the border, is a good spanking. Of course, I don't blame the Mexicans for kidnapping our agents, if they were book agents, as they probably were. Mexico needs education and books, and possibly that is why she swiped the agents. We shan't go to war with Mexico because Mr. Jenkins was kidnapped, or because, as the Red propagandists say, he kidnapped himself. A few Jenkinses more or less do not matter, but heaven help the Mexicans if they ever kidnap a Dooley or a Murphy, for if they do no barricade of whiskers will ever protect Carranza from a trouncing. If a general is needed, William Randolph Hearst will lead the army. Mr. Hearst would like to force us into war with Mexico where he has quite some ranch, and also he would like to plunge us into war with Britain, which would embroil our good neighbor, Canada, and possibly involve us in war with Japan. After years of study and observation, I have come to the conclusion that the things that Mr. Hearst wants are the very things that the American people do not want. American citizens, however, in Mexico and all over the world, must be protected. Mexicans regard us with contempt and kill Americans with impunity. We have coddled them so much they think they can do as they like with us. They took mighty good care, however, in the past, not to kill a Britisher or a German, and, too, they were rabidly pro-German all through the war. It is hard to punish a whole people, most of them poor, ignorant, exploited and half-civilized, for the misdeeds of their fatuous, arrogant rulers on the one hand and their murderous banditti on the other. Mexico, if left alone, may find herself eventually, but in the process of evolution she must restrain her marauding and mutinous subjects from raiding our territory and slaughtering our citizens. If she does not do that she will get into trouble. A prominent American, writing from the City of

Choosing Curves

SOME long time ago a wise man said that the curved line was the line of beauty. By which he meant, my dears, that angles were not pretty—whether in elbows, sharp shoulder-blades, pointed chins, or other less personal connections. But there are some limitations which I wish he had added to his statement for the benefit of the twentieth century young girl. When I walk down the boulevard and see waists slinking in in front and shoulders hunched forward in an attempt at languid elegance, while the spine describes a curve like Robin Hood's bow, I feel tempted to say a word in favor of straight lines!

What do you suppose is going to happen to all the youthful lungs which are shut up in the narrow chests such attitudes produce? Lungs have to have room to expand. Take a large sponge in your hand and partly close the hand. How much water do you suppose that sponge could hold under such conditions? Then open the hand generously and see the sponge expand. Our lungs are like sponges. They can be contracted and expanded. And if the chest walls are drawn in so that they crowd the lungs, that means that less air can be held, and less air means less purification of the blood, for it is the air which we take into our lungs which cleans house for us—sweeps the impurities out of our blood and makes us new every minute. Imagine the result when the lungs are so crowded that the air can only fill a certain number of cells.

I wish you'd all think about this and make up your minds to give your lungs all the room they can possibly fill. The only way you can do this is by standing straight and throwing the chest up a little, while dropping the shoulders. Deep breathing will not only strengthen the lungs but increase their capacity, so practice deep breathing at least twice a day, and as you walk to and from school, market, your friends' houses, breathe in as much air with every breath as you possibly can.

Did you know that when you feel a little chilled, which may mean the beginning of a hard cold, you can often warm the entire body and drive away the cold, by standing still and breathing to your very toes—to exaggerate a little—for a few minutes? Try it.

Incidentally, let me remind you that anything which increases your chest measurement will increase the apparent size of your bust, and from the hundreds of letters I receive asking for a few more inches bust measure, I imagine this will be good news to many of my girls. So, breathe deeply, stand and walk with chest up and out, and grow pretty and healthy at the same time.

Answers to Questions

MRS. F. S. R.—I am very sorry I cannot express an opinion as to any proprietary article. There are several reasons for this—first, no one person could possibly try every proprietary article on the market; but more important still, what accomplishes good results for one person may not accomplish the same good for another, conditions being different. And a general opinion, such as the opinion of any one person must be, is not a good guide in such matters. If your hair is slow of growth, I urge nightly scalp massage according to the directions printed many times, and quite lately, in COMFORT. The object of massage is to loosen the skin from the skull and so permit the blood to circulate more freely. Nourishment for the hair comes from the blood, so if you want your hair to grow, keep your skin loose on your skull, the scalp well shampooed, the hair gently brushed each night and left hanging loose to air, and then look to your diet. Eat nourishing foods three times a day but not between meals, and be sure to drink plenty of water.

MRS. B. C. C.—For superfluous hair, it is peroxide of hydrogen that I recommend, and ammonia. I should try the ammonia the druggist gave you. If it proves too strong for your skin, irritating it, dilute it a little. However, some of the "toilet ammonias" are so diluted that they have not strength enough to kill the hair. Do not use the ammonia except on the particular hairy spot you wish to remove. Don't bother about the fine down which most of us have on our faces. It is better to leave it alone, and nobody on earth ever notices this. You may, of course, when you are facing a mirror and looking for defects, but if you will look carefully at the people you know you will find that many of them have considerable hair on their faces, and that you have never noticed it before. Don't attach too much importance to a little hair, though if there is some special spot, like the corners of the lips, where there is quite a little dark hair, it is the wise plan to remove it. The object of the peroxide is to bleach the hair—that of the ammonia to take the life out of it, killing it eventually. You say your hands are red and rough. Be very careful to rub your hands perfectly dry whenever you take them out of water. Careless wiping of hands is responsible for most of the chapped and red hands, and too much soap for practically all the rest of the trouble. You see, what soap does is to take off the surface skin. This exposes a softer skin; then if you take that off with more soap, and keep this process up, the skin is so tender that it chaps and reddens. You say you do your housework, but why not take as much care of your hands as possible? You can buy cotton household gloves to use for sweeping and dusting, and you can use a dishmop for a great portion of your dish-washing. Even an old stocking leg slipped over the hand helps to protect it when dusting, making beds, and doing all the other things about a house which roughen or soil the skin. And when your hands must be used in water, be sure to rinse them carefully so that no soap is left in the pores, and then dry thoroughly, especially rubbing the knuckles. Water in which bran has been boiled is good for washing the hands. And you should rub on some good hand lotion a couple of times a day—something that will be absorbed by the skin, not an ointment. One thing you should be careful about is extremes of temperature; for instance, if you take your hands out of very hot water, and go out into a cold shed, your hands will crack and roughen. Be more gradual; don't go from hot to cold, or from cold to hot without giving the hands time to get over their extreme of temperature. It is because of these things that your hands are rough and red in winter and not in summer. Here is a good lotion for whitening the hands:

EVELYN.—How to darken your eyebrows and eyelashes? Buy an eyebrow pencil of your druggist. But, my dear, let me say a word. Unless your eyebrows are almost invisible, I shouldn't darken them, for they almost always show that they have been touched up. Try oiling them each night with a little olive oil, and brushing them from the nose toward the temple, following the line of a slight arch. Use an eyebrow brush—which won't cost you more than an eyebrow pencil, and looks like a baby's toothbrush. It is a good plan to wash the eyebrows in the morning, then brush them against the grain or toward the nose vigorously, and finally brush them back toward the temple in the way they should like. I think if you will keep this up for a few weeks, your eyebrows will have so improved that you will give up all idea of an eyebrow pencil—I hope so. As to the eyelashes, don't brush those, but do anoint the edges of the lids very gently at night with the warm olive oil. Be careful not to rub the eyes on waking in the morning, for this does more harm to the lashes than anything else. If the eyelid feels irritated at any time, instead of rubbing it, put a little oil on the finger-tip and gently anoint it.

MAYME.—Blackheads are nothing but little pores in the skin which have filled with dust—in other words, blackheads are specks of dirt lodged in the pores of the skin. The cure is to stimulate the skin to keep its pores active and to throw off all secretions for if the pores are careless about their work, the little secretions they contain catch the dust and become disfiguring. Here is what I recommend: Every night before you go to bed, wash thoroughly in warm soapy water, with a washcloth or a complexion brush, then rinse many times, and finally use cool water for the last rinsing. This will help to close the pores. In the morning wash with warm water—very slightly warm—and not soap, and rinse in cold water. Try not to keep washing the face during the day. Wiping it off with a cool damp cloth will probably remove any dust which needs removing, but of course if it is dirty it must be washed. Pimples are often caused by clogged pores hardening and becoming inflamed, so keep your pores open.

CLELIA.—The best thing for superfluous hair is the peroxide and ammonia treatment—using the peroxide of hydrogen one day, and the ammonia the next, to dampen the hairy spot. This is a slow treatment and requires patience and persistence but it will accomplish the result in the long run. Of course, the electric needle is quicker and more satisfactory if you have a good operator, but unless you are where you can get this done by an expert, the peroxide and ammonia is the best home treatment of which I know.

LILLIE.—See answer to "Clelia."

SUNSHINE.—I am glad the exercises for reducing hips and legs are proving so successful for you. Your measurements seem very good, though according to strict rules your waist should be two inches larger—the waist is usually ten inches smaller than the bust, and bust and hips should have the same measurement. Now about those arms and shoulders.

To Reduce Arms

To make fat arms smaller, grasp the upper left arm firmly with the right hand and push the flesh toward the left as far as possible on the arm bone. Then grasp the arm again just below the point of the first grip and push the flesh in a similar manner. This is like a wringing motion, and you should go over the upper arm—the lower arm, too, if that is over-fat—a number of times with this motion. Repeat twice a day, treating first the left and then the right arm.

To Reduce Shoulder

Standing erect, raise arms on a level with the shoulders, and extend out in front, back of hand to back of hand. Now throw the arms back as if you were trying to make them meet in the middle of the back. Do not let them fall below the shoulder line, and as you make this vigorous motion, inhale. Then bring the arms back to the front again, exhaling as you do so, and repeat the movement.

ting erect and regarding Violet with amazement. "You have been locked up for three or four weeks, and in this part of the city? Who locked you up?"

"Wilhelm," said Violet, thinking it best to come to the point at once.

"What?"

"Yes, your husband—Wilhelm Mencke."

"Mercy! is he here in New York?" panted the astonished woman, growing pale at the announcement.

"Yes, and has been for many months—I first met him on the street one day last spring."

"How did he look—as if he were prosperous?" his wife questioned, eagerly.

"Not very—he asked me for money," said Violet.

"Faugh!" returned Mrs. Mencke, with an expression of disgust. "I hope you didn't give him any."

"Yes, a little. I hadn't the heart to refuse him as long as I had it."

"Well, I wouldn't have given him a dime, after he had spent a fortune for me as he has for you," was the spirited retort. "But," returning to the former subject, "what did he lock you up for?"

Violet related how she had been kidnapped, and her sister listened to the recital with wondering interest.

"What could have been his object?" she questioned, when Violet concluded.

"He tried to make me think that it was for the reward that would be offered for me; but I have learned since that he had another object," she replied.

"Yes, of course he had—Wilhelm is a schemer," said his wife; "but what was it?"

Violet then told her about the paper that he had tried to make her sign, and also of the letter which she had found and read later.

"Aha!" exclaimed Mrs. Mencke, with considerable excitement, "so Jonas Huntington has turned up at last, and with a fortune, too! I have always thought it was very singular that we never heard anything about him. And he has left all his money to you," she concluded, with evident jealousy, a sneer curling her proud lip.

"I have told you all that I know about the matter, Belle," Violet answered, flushing at her sister's manner. "The letter simply spoke of the property that Jonas Huntington had left to Miss Violet Huntington, and stated that since I was not living, you were next of kin and Wilhelm could not claim the money, as it was evident he had tried to do, unless he could prove that you were also dead."

"I should think that Uncle Jonas might have divided it between us," Mrs. Mencke remarked, resentfully.

"You know that he named me, Belle, so I suppose that was his reason for his leaving it to me, and it may not be very much after all. But you shall not want for anything—as soon as you get over this cold we will go to Cincinnati together—I will prove myself the heir and then you shall have a comfortable home," Violet returned, kindly and generously.

"All the same I think it was mean in Uncle Jonas to leave everything to you," was the sullen and unappreciative reply, and then she appeared to sink into a disagreeable reverie.

A few moments later there came a knock at the door.

"Hush!" whispered Mrs. Mencke, with a startled look. I don't want any one to see you here, Violet—step back into the attic stairway while I go to the door."

Violet could not understand the need of so much secrecy, for of course she had a perfect right to visit her sister if she was so disposed; but she silently obeyed the command while Mrs. Mencke hastily slipped on a wrapper and then

It proved to be only the woman who lived below and who occasionally brought her up a newspaper to read, when she was fortunate enough to have one herself.

Mrs. Mencke took the paper and thanked her; then closing the door again, carefully locked it, after which she called Violet from her place of concealment.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"IT EXPLAINS EVERYTHING TO ME."

"Have you had your supper, Violet?" Mrs. Mencke asked, as her sister sat down by the fire, looking somewhat pale and weary.

"No; but I am not hungry, Belle, and I think that I will go at once to Mr. Lawrence's. I know that he must have been terribly anxious about me all these weeks, and I want to relieve him as soon as possible from suspense."

A peculiar gleam shot into Mrs. Mencke's eyes at this.

"No, indeed, Violet, you must not go tonight; you are not in a very reputable portion of the city, and you could not go a block by yourself without being insulted. You must stay with me tonight—you are perfectly safe here—and take daylight to return to your Fifth Avenue prince."

Violet did not exactly like the tone her sister adopted, for there was a suspicion of a sneer in those last words. But she saw that she was right—she knew there would be danger in going out alone, and she might be miles from Fifth Avenue. A few hours could not make very much difference, so she decided to remain where she was.

Mrs. Mencke prepared some tea and toast for Violet, and after this humble repast had been eaten, they sat at the table for a long time.

Then Violet, at the urgent solicitation of her sister, undressed and went to bed. In less than fifteen minutes she was sleeping soundly; but Mrs. Mencke, drawing the light nearer the fire, sat down to read her newspaper.

It was not often that she had one, and now she greedily devoured its contents, beginning with the first page and reading every column. She did not even skip the advertisements, for she was always on the lookout for something to better her condition, and so, strangely enough, she finally came upon this personal:

WANTED.—To learn the whereabouts of Mrs. B——— M———, formerly of Cincinnati. She will learn something to her advantage if she will confer with W. M., No. 90 ——— Street, New York City.

"Wilhelm put that in the paper, and he has some deep scheme in mind," Mrs. Mencke mused, a keen look leaping into her eyes. "Violet said he wanted to find me; it must be something about this property she has been telling me about and which he wants to get control of. Ah, I see his game now!" she added, with some excitement. "He heard about this fortune and tried to find me, hoping to reap some benefit from the fact that I would inherit it, Violet being dead. Then he met Violet, and that seemed likely to upset all his plans, so he kidnapped her, intending to keep her out of sight until he could get track of me and through me the control of the money. He probably wants a third fortune to squander, like the other two; but my wisdom teeth are cut, fortunately, and whatever I may possess hereafter shall be at my exclusive disposal. I may need him, however, to help me in my plans, and I believe I will answer this advertisement. It is a shame that Jonas Huntington should have made Violet his sole heir—it isn't fair, and I shall not submit to such unjust partiality."

She bent a stealthy, vindictive look upon the sleeper on the bed, but the fair girl was oblivious of everything around her, and after pondering deeply for half an hour longer, she arose to get pen, ink and paper, and then wrote a brief note, which she sealed and directed to her husband at the address he had given in the advertisement.

This done, she burned the paper, then, muffling herself in a heavy shawl, she stole quietly from the room, taking her letter with her.

She was not absent more than ten minutes, and retired immediately upon her return.

The next morning, when Violet awoke, her first thought was of her recovered freedom, while all the anxiety and depression of the previous evening had disappeared.

The sun was shining cheerfully into the room, and she knew that the day was fair and bright.

Her spirits arose as she thought of going back to Mr. Lawrence within a few hours, and to the delightful home from which she had been so long absent.

Should she return to remain with him as his adopted daughter? The question had never been decided, and now, after her recent experience, it forced itself upon her with more of temptation than ever before.

It was very home-like and pleasant in his beautiful Fifth Avenue residence: it was delightful to be with one so kind and cultured, and, now that there was a prospect of her having money of her own and she would not be dependent upon his bounty, she did not shrink so sensitively from giving him a parent's place in her regard, or from availing herself of his protection. It seemed more desirable than ever since Wilhelm's recent persecution.

Yes, she believed she should consent to the adoption; and having settled this important question, she began to plan what pleasant things she would do to make life enjoyable to her kind friend, and how much good she would try to do with the money that was coming to her.

But her attention was soon distracted from these pleasant musings by groans from her sister.

"What is the matter, Belle?" she inquired, anxiously.

"Oh, I'm afraid I'm worse this morning," was the plaintive reply.

"Worse? Did you take more cold last night?"

"Perhaps so. Won't you get up and fix me something warm to drink? pleaded Mrs. Mencke, apparently in great distress.

Violet immediately arose and dressed herself, and, under her sister's directions, prepared something for her to take. But she appeared to gain no relief from the potion, for she continued to moan, and seemed very ill.

"You need a doctor, Belle," the young girl said.

"Yes, I do. I sent for one before you awoke—he will be here by and by."

"You sent for one befofe I awoke!" repeated Violet, in astonishment. "I did not know that you had been up. Why did you not call me and let me wait upon you?"

"I did not like to wake you, you seemed so tired last night and were sleeping so quietly. But you will not leave me until I am better, will you, Violet?" the woman continued craftily.

"Of course not," Violet responded unsuspiciously. "I will remain until you get relief; but I must write a note to Mr. Lawrence and tell him where I am—he shall not be kept in suspense any longer about me."

"Well, you will find paper, pens and ink on the mantel, and you can send it out by the doctor to be mailed," Mrs. Mencke replied, a peculiar smile curling her lips.

Violet sat down at once to write her note, telling Mr. Lawrence something of what had happened during the last three or four weeks, but saying she might not be able to leave her sister for a day or two if she should continue to be ill.

This occupied her longer than she had intended it should; for she forgot herself while writing; but it was finished at last, and then she proceeded to get her sister and herself some breakfast.

Not being used to such work, it took her considerable time, and it was after nine o'clock when they partook of their meal.

Then Mrs. Mencke, pretending to be more comfortable, said she would have on her wrapper and sit up while Violet made her bed. This was done, and the room nearly put in order, when steps were heard ascending the stairs, and presently there came a knock upon the door.

"The doctor," said Violet, looking relieved, and hastened to let him in, when she suddenly found herself confronted by Wilhelm Mencke.

She uttered a low cry of dismay, then stood spellbound by terror for a moment, gazing at him with a wild, frightened stare.

The next she turned and faced her sister, all her spirit in arms, for she understood at once the treachery that had thus thrown her again into the power of her knavish brother-in-law.

"Belle," she cried indignantly, "you have betrayed me!"

PLEASANT PLAIN, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am ten years old, four feet six in my stocking feet. I go to school and am in the fifth grade. I also go to Sunday School and church. I live on a farm near Marathon with my parents and three sisters. I have no brothers. Don't you think they have cheated me? I have driven the pony right along ever since I was six years old. I also have a dog we call Sport. He helps to keep the chickens out of the garden. I have an aunt that is a red cross nurse. She is stationed in Pennsylvania at present. I also have a cousin that served nine months over seas that is home now.

Your nephew, EARL SHAFFER.

Congratulations, Earl, on your dandy letter. So you are four feet six in your stocking feet. I am sorry to say that affords no definite indication as to your exact height. Since the dear, patriotic girls started knitting socks for their soldier boys and relatives (and I suppose you have been equally favored, Earl) it is a mere matter of conjecture as to just how tall a man may or may not be. I know a man who was six feet tall in his stocking feet, but when he took the stockings off he was only five feet. You see, his sister had knitted the stockings. Well, it is a good thing for a single young man to get all the wool he can on his feet for the chances are when he gets married he will have mighty little of it on his head—his wife will attend to that. With a prohibition country, however, men will have a better chance of retaining their hair as well as their equilibrium. Glad to know you go to Sunday school and church, Earl. Keep it up. In this age of atheism, anarchy and unrest, the future of this and all countries lies in the hands of those who have had Christian training. You ask if I don't think you have been cheated in being deprived of a brother. No, I don't think so, Earl, for you would probably have been more cheated if you had had one. Brothers, as a rule, take a particular delight in "cheating" one another. Think how glorious it must be to have three sisters, especially when they want (and they always want) to pull a hay rake through your hair and stuff your mouth and ears full of soap about every three minutes of the day and night. It seems to me you might give that poor pony a rest if you have been driving him right along ever since you were six years old. Now that the hired man wants six hundred dollars a month and board, it must save lots of money to have a helpful dog like Sport, which keeps a watchful eye on the chickens and never goes on strike. I am glad to know you have an aunt who is a Red Cross nurse. They are the noblest and most useful women on the face of the earth.

WALT HILL, NEB.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a girl of eleven years have blue eyes and light hait and live on a farm six miles from town the farm is a hunderd acres we have ten horses. Three cows. And about three hunderd chickens I go to school and am in the fifth grade. Uncle Charlie I have got two subs and I want your story book Uncle I want to see my letter in the Feb paper and will you put the song in When Barny flew Over The hills to his Darline.

ZELLA MARTIN.

Zella, you have some highly original ideas regarding spelling and punctuation. But then, you are only a little girl and maybe your school, like so many others, is suffering from a shortage of efficient teachers. Magazines are not rushed into print over night as are the daily newspapers. We magazine contributors have to have our matter printed, then a copy of this matter, which is called proof, is sent to us to look over. The proof is returned to the editor and the process of arranging the pages and advertising has to be gone through. In fact, if you knew what a lot of work is involved in the getting out of a magazine, you would not write one month and expect your letter to appear in print the next. Zella, I do not possess a copy of that immortal old ballad, "When Barney Flew Over the Hills to His Darling," but doubtless some of our readers will be kind enough to see that you get what you want. In case, however, no one has a copy of this song on hand, you don't need to break your heart about it as I have written a few verses on the subject which will probably hold you for a while.

When Barney flew over the hills,
His pride and his darling to see,
His engine went dead and he fell on her head,
Now they sleep in the cold cemetree.

When Barney flew over the hills,
Said he to his darling, "Oh my,"
When he sat down and talked, "I'd rather have walked,
But the cost of shoe leather's too high."

When Barney flew over the hills,
His airplane came down with a flop,
But his darling, bedad, didn't grieve for her lad,
But eloped with a fat Irish cop.

When Barney flew over the hills,
His darling remarked, "How absurd!"
And exclaimed with disdain, "Don't you come round again,
It's a man that I want, not a bird."

Zella, if you want any more, just drop me a card, as I have plenty of the same brand on tap.

RAYMOND CITY, W. VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

What did you get for Christmas? Santa was very good to me and gave me a lot of things I am very proud of. I had two brothers in the army and both came back with a sad tale about the little French children. I am so glad so many of the cousins gave

His Good Mother

By Yetta Kay Stoddard

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

"THERE'S marks of a good mother on him, if ever I saw them, and I can detect good or bad breeding at six months, ma'am."

"But you say, Mrs. Jiznot, that you have no papers for him. We had decided to take a younger child, one whose parents were respectable." Ammy Tarbox looked knowingly over lowered spectacles at her husband, who telepathed, "We're taking no chances."

"Outside show of respectableness don't go far with some, ma'am. Them that's had the best papers have sometimes gone straight to the penitentiary as fast as the getting would take them, in spite of our doing what we could to keep them out; and two or three weazened foundlings, nameless, half-dead with bad blood, that didn't seem worth saving, have turned out A-1 citizens. It's something deeper than names on paper that we learn to know them by."

"Will you let us see the ones that came of decent parentage?" asked Ammy, firmly.

Mrs. Jiznot rose. "You can go upstairs, Whicket," she said to the five-year-old boy who leaned against her knee, studying the hard faces of the Tarbox couple. His gray eyes glinted back at them—in the matter of unsympathetic glances giving them as good as they sent. Then, catching sight of the shiny gold chain festooned above Sanford Tarbox's waistline, he followed, unnoticed, close at heel, as the party toured the asylum.

When Providence bestows a child you take unquestioningly what comes. You would have had none other if the choice of the babies of the world had been yours. When you child-hunt you go fastidious. Red hair with brown eyes you fancy not, though the colorings belong to the handsomest of your kind. You see an angel-faced darling and exclaim, "This—this seems as if it were my very own," and the matron freezes your blood with, "Father and mother deficients with long criminal records." You take home one that resembles distantly your mental conception of what you wanted, and the years reveal that he whom you had intended to manage the business in your old age, succeed you after your demise, is a hopeless case of arrested mentality, a perpetual embarrassment.

Ammy and Sanford stood at the street door. "I'm sorry, Mrs. Jiznot," Mrs. Tarbox was saying. "We didn't find any that just suited. We'll call again. There's no hurry. Good by."

A little hand was touching the gold chain. Sanford looked down to see Whicket smiling generously, admiringly. "Very pretty," he murmured.

"I told you to go upstairs," commanded Mrs. Jiznot, not unkindly. Whicket turned.

"He's a dear little chap, Ammy," Sanford ventured. He had seen something Ammy had missed. The small figure began the long up-journey, hugging close to the friendly bannister. "I've forgotten what he looked like. We've seen so many," Ammy said.

"Come back a minute, Whicket," called Mrs. Jiznot. "Really, Mrs. Tarbox, I can recommend him. Of all the children that have gone through here in my time, he's my choice. The marks of a good mother are on him, nice habits—something sweet inside—you know what I mean."

"What's your name, sonny?" asked Ammy, with a welling up of genuine mothering towards him.

"Whicket Inyat Loroon."

"I feel like taking him just for the pleasure of naming him over," Ammy laughed, the light of her fun-loving spirit momentarily glowing. The boy saw it and went on:

"No one else has a name like mine. There's three Johns and seven Franks and——"

"Let's take him, Ammy!" Sanford put his arm around the child. "Do you ever send them out on trial, Mrs. Jiznot?"

"We do everything to try to launch them safely. There's such lots coming along all the time."

"I suppose there's some kind of record," questioned Ammy. "Never mind clothes. We'll get something as we go through town." Mrs. Jiznot opened the safe and turned to the meager information entered on a page of her private memorandum book.

October 8, 1907. Male child found by Hester Jiznot at 4.20 A. M. on asylum front doorstep. Hand-printed card sewed to underskirt said, My name is Whicket Inyat Loroon. Born September 13, 1903. Please be very good to me for my dying mother's sake.

"That's all, ma'am." Mrs. Jiznot put the book back into the safe. "There was a locket on the string around his neck, but one of the big girls either lost or stole it, quite recently. That's what makes him so sad-like. He keeps saying, 'My pretty mother is gone.' He remembers she said she would be always with him, when she went away."

"We'll take him from month to month. If we like him and he us, we'll adopt him." Sanford took one of the little fists, Ammy the other, and started for home—their big, lonely, empty farmhouse on the other side of the city.

"What's that?" asked Whicket, pointing to a large gilt frame that hung, back foremost, above the mantel in the dining-room.

"He's beginning fine, isn't he?" Ammy asked, bitterly. The hard looks that Whicket had first seen came into the woman's face. He glanced at Sanford. They were there also—terrible looks for a child to see—such a helpless child, unprotected, among people who could put on expressions of hatred, cruelty! Whicket had never been struck but he had seen other naughty orphan children beaten and hurt and he knew what angry grown people sometimes did to little ones. He shrunk away, saying:

"I want to go back to Jizzy. I want to find my pretty mother."

"Listen, Whicket," said Ammy, as Sanford, white and unsteady, staggered from the room. "Never, never look up there. Never speak of that thing when—when—"she was searching for a name that Whicket could use—"when Father Sanny is here. That is a bad, bad, bad girl—understand?"

Whicket gazed very understandingly indeed. Perhaps his good mother had put the mark of such strange knowledge as that upon his baby heart.

"I believe you know what I am saying, you dear!" The hard, hurt lines melted from Ammy Tarbox's face. Tears rolled tempestuously, as she drew the child into her bosom, casting a sorrowful upward glance at the place where her daughter's innocent prettiness should be looking back at her. The usual household tragedy the ugly object above the mantel suggested; an unforeseen swift blow that had brought unusual shock, heart-crushing, to this couple—upright and clean themselves, descended both along lines of those whose integrity had been unassailable, expecting clean-living from all belonging to them. And Azabel had been a pure, radiant lily, the white immaculate flower of all their kin.

"Now we'll have supper," Ammy said, rising, taking off her wraps and showing Whicket where to put his new cap and jacket. Out to the big bright kitchen they went, into the first of the many happy hours there to be worked through together. The childish wonder-questions brought and kept smiles glimmering on Ammy's countenance. When Sanford came in, his own grim face lighted at the sight of Whicket carrying the potato tureen.

"He's so smart!" commented Ammy in a whisper to Sammy, as she heaped cushions into a chair for Whicket to occupy between them.

The child smiled from one to the other. Then he noticed the plate at the other side of the board. "What's that for?" he began but left the question unfinished, before the older faces could get back the terrible troubled look he had already learned to fear. It was the last approach to a grievous mistake on Whicket's part, in all his dealings with his foster-parents. From that hour forward he went winning his way into their hearts, in and in, returning them genuine lasting love—the richest reward they hoped for.

Reporting satisfactory progress to Mrs. Jiznot, "He is really remarkable," Mrs. Tarbox would often say in an aside. "We must keep in touch with you so that if ever you hear anything about his people, you can let us know. We owe it to him to find out. I don't believe we'll discover a bad lot. Why, sometimes, do you know, I feel myself in the presence of something almost holy, with that little child beside me?"

"It's the mark his mother left on him. I saw it in the way he washed his little hands, as if he had been taught to love to be clean," Mrs. Jiznot corroborated.

Whicket kept his odd name. "His mother gave it to him. We may as well respect it. It's all he has that she gave him," said Sanford one day when Ammy proposed changing it to Sanford, Jr. They had taken out adoption papers. The boy was as nearly their own as mutual love and the law could make him.

"She gave him a lot more, that mother. More than you and I could if she hadn't impressed it on him first. Goodness she gave him. I love her for what she gave Whicket when she must have been in dire straits. Oh, I long to have her know what he is turning out to be." There were tears of deep emotion in Ammy's voice as well as in her eyes, called up by thoughts of the marks that wicked Azabel must have put upon her child, if ever she had had one. They did not know; nor even if she lived. They told themselves that they did not care.

And along Whicket's years the memory of his beautiful mother lingered. He had lost her words, the sound of her voice, the touch of her hands, but Mrs. Jiznot and Ammy had told him that his mother had said that her love would be with him wherever she was. The belief in that statement freshened as he grew towards young manhood. The recollection of his mistake when he had taken the first step across the Tarbox threshold kept him always unseeing, mute, in respect to the unsightly object above the mantel, the fourth plate at table. Then when old enough to understand it all, in loving sympathy for his parents he shared their honest shame—glad not to have to communicate his knowledge to his mother. "She could not have understood such a thing," he told himself. When, once, alone in the house, he had been tempted to climb up and take a look at the face of the vile creature—his foster-sister, he considered her—the thought of that stainless lovely mother of his restrained him.

The management of the big farm began to show the results of young Whicket's capable mind and strong hands. The pride of Father Sanny and Mother Ammy grew with the boy's growing manliness. What Whicket proposed they found good to be carried out; they sat planning for his future through most of the hours of their slowing-up years.

"I'm taking a load of Pearmains to town tomorrow. Want to go along, Father?" Broad-shouldered Whicket touched Sanny's shining gold chain.

The old man recalled the little Whicket that had caught at his heart, there at the orphan asylum door fifteen years before.

"No, I'll not go, but don't forget to leave a barrel for Mrs. Jiznot's kiddies. The Tarboxes still called on the good matron. Long they had kept the hope that sometime a clear record, showing honorable parentage for Whicket, would come to light. That hope had died; but the custom of remembering Mrs. Jiznot's large family at harvest time was one they intended to continue.

Whicket was late returning from town. He burst into the dining-room where his parents awaited him.

"What do you suppose? Mrs. Jiznot has found my locket! It was in a joint of the frame of the crib I slept in. See, we have at last a clue to my mother's identity." He placed the case in Ammy's hands and went out to put up the team.

The excited old couple drew near the light, adjusted spectacles and peered, squinting and pucker-lipped, into the tiny gold frame. Suddenly they stood apart, breathless, staring large-eyed at each other.

"Azabel!" groaned Sanford, dropping into his chair, shaking as if fever-stricken.

"Hush! Straighten up, Sanny! Whicket must not know!"

"Isn't she a beauty?" called a happy voice from the washroom.

"Indeed she is!" answered Ammy, steadily.

That night when the young man was deep in glad dreams of finding his lovely lost one, two old night-capped prowlers stealthily took down and replaced the gilt frame above the dining-room mantel, having removed therefrom the crayon portrait of a bad, bad, bad girl. As the flames leaped swiftly across the smiling features Azabel seemed to challenge her parents to continued and deepening love of her son.

"Remember that I left the marks of a good mother on Whicket. You have seen them yourselves, dear hearts."

"We did not understand. Forgive, little one. Yes, we will think of you that way, as a good mother." They did not say the words, but the promise was recorded none the less.

Glistening Teeth

Are Seen Everywhere Now—This is Why

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Look about you and you'll see that countless teeth look whiter nowadays. It is evident on every hand that a new method of teeth cleaning has come into vogue.

All over America leading dentists are advising it. And millions of people have proved it at home, by using a 10-Day Tube.

That new method is Pepsodent, and this is what it does.

It Combats Film

There forms on teeth a viscous film. You can feel it with your tongue.

It is the teeth's great enemy—the cause of most tooth troubles. Yet brushing in the old ways left much of it intact. No tooth paste could dissolve it. So millions of teeth, despite the brushing, discolored and decayed.

The film is clinging. It enters crevices and hardens. The periodic cleaning in the dentist's chair is to remove it. But between times it may do a ceaseless damage.

Film Ruins Teeth

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Dental science has for years sought a way to fight film. Now that way is found. Able authorities have proved this beyond question. The use has spread, through dentists and through home tests, until millions of teeth are now benefited by it.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And everyone who writes us is supplied with a 10-Day Tube.

Watch the Quick Results

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

A new discovery has made pepsin possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But now a harmless activating method has been found. Now active pepsin can be constantly applied.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Do this for your sake and your family's sake. There are few things more important. The damage which film does to teeth is life-long in effect. Cut out the coupon now.

for me to read. She has learned the little verse you sent and can spell several words.

I am twenty-seven years old and have dark hair and blue eyes. Am five feet, four inches tall and weigh 115 pounds.

With love and best wishes to all the sisters, and Mrs. Wilkinson,

MRS. W. D. FORD.

GREEN FOREST, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Though your department is for ladies only, I am sure that when you hear my plea, and understand the nature of my errand, you will not close the door upon me, even though I am but a young man of 22.

I have watched with profound interest, the efforts of the sisters to purchase a home for Uncle Charlie as a substantial mark of their appreciation and gratitude for the patriotic, humane and inspiring work that has been done through the columns of COMFORT.

War drives and excitement are probably responsible for the fact that this beautiful and Christ-like act was not consummated within a few weeks of its inception.

If a few thousand people stirred to the depths by religious emotion, can present a six thousand dollar automobile to a healthy and wealthy evangelist, why cannot the six million readers of COMFORT be stirred by similar and worthier emotions, and present a home that costs not much more than an auto, to our evangelist who is neither healthy nor wealthy?

It pleases me to see that nearly all the good women who write to the sisters' department are filled with the Christ spirit, but that greatest of all evangelists said in the good Book, that faith without works was dead; to talk so much of Christ and ignore the one who has set such a wonderful example of the Christ-spirit, seems to put us in the same position with the Levite who passed by on the other side, and left the work of ministering to the sick to that good Samaritan, who through all the ages has been the symbol of service, sympathy and love.

But to more practical matters: to make a success of the Uncle Charlie Home Fund, certain facts should be made clear. I have heard from my brother when he was in New York City and Brooklyn, and I have read of conditions in those (and other) large cities, which affect real estate and rental values. Owing to the lack of house construction during the war, congestion in the large cities is terrible. Speculators buy houses and double rents, and I have heard that Uncle Charlie's home may, at any time, be sold over his head. Then, I suppose, he will want to buy the house he occupies (which he cannot do), have his little home broken up and be forced to go to a hospital; and, as I understand it is a physical impossibility to move him, without endangering his life—a life that is precious to us all—and we must see that the home he occupies is his without delay.

Had we gone "over the top" in this undertaking three years ago, we would have saved about one thousand dollars Uncle Charlie has had to pay for rent; and as the value of property has increased so enormously, another thousand might have been saved, had we hustled instead of dallied; another thing: every day we hesitate, robs Uncle Charlie of just so much satisfaction and pleasure in knowing that the home which shelters him, was provided by friends who love him.

Uncle Charlie is growing older and his health is very precarious. Therefore, how would we feel, six million of us, if he should pass beyond our ken, without having done for him a millionth part of what he has done for others.

Now, as I have tried to place this matter before you, both in a practical and business-like way, there surely can be no possible excuse to offer, unless we wish to confess that we are lip Christians and slackers for not bringng this project to a glorious conclusion. Is this beautiful work we honor COMFORT, ourselves and prove to the world that Christianity is still a living, breathing force; not a lifeless and soulless thing.

May God, the giver of every good and perfect gift, pour out his richest blessing upon Uncle Charlie and every reader of COMFORT.

Sincerely, ROY R. SMITH.

SOMEWHERE IN THE UNITED STATES.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Will you give space in your corner to an old bachelor on the shady side of fifty? No, I am not going to give any advice as to how to treat a wife, or raise children. However, in this day of crazy theory chasing, suppose that it would be entirely proper to give lengthy abstractions on the above subjects.

I want to make a suggestion to the readers of COMFORT that is very near my heart and one which I trust will touch their hearts and purses. It is in regard to a home for Uncle Charlie. I am enclosing four dimes from four readers of COMFORT to start the monument and if dimes fail we will back the monument with dollars. I cannot help but believe that Uncle Charlie would rather have a home built with dimes than with dollars. COMFORT has more than one million subscribers and at least five million readers. If one tenth of our readers would give a dime it would be $50,000—which would get Uncle Charlie a home and if anything should be left over it could be used for a trust fund and the income used to buy tin cans with which to feed Billy the Goat.

I have been a reader of COMFORT for twenty years and have learned to love Uncle Charlie. I love him for his gentle humor and wit without a sting. I love him for the clean, wholesome advice that he gives the boys and girls, young men and young women. I love him for his patriotism and one hundred per cent Americanism. I love him as a permanent builder of law and order.

Governor Coolidge, of Massachusetts, is being mentioned for President on account of his magnificent stand for law and order. In my opinion, Uncle Charlie is doing a greater work for he is teaching the youth—by the millions—to back such leaders as Governor Coolidge.

Our zealous friends gave the late Admiral Dewey a home that was not appreciated but let us buy Uncle Charlie a dime home, feeling sure that he will appreciate the love that touched the thousands of hearts that prompted the gift.

I would urge all of Uncle Charlie's friends, male and female, to pause in their realization of the physical handicap that Uncle Charlie has overcome, and contribute a dime for Uncle Charlie's home. He is surfeited with sympathy.

I have found some heroines in the Sisters' Corner and have enjoyed their letters but advise them not to take Bachelor Bill's letters too seriously. I am a bachelor and know the breed.

A JOLLY OLD BACHELOR.

Jolly Old Bachelor.—It is very unwise to disagree with a man but if you are a jolly one maybe you won't mind so very much; anyway, it is in a good cause so I'll take a chance. It's just in the matter of dimes for Uncle Charlie for I feel sure we'd get along famously on all other subjects. A dime, J. O. B. (that doesn't mean I'm getting you mixed with the Biblical character of well-known patience—though I'm sure you are themselves to Uncle Sam when he needed them. Uncle do you think there are any good men? Sometimes I think there are none. I have a lot of friends and have been in their homes and, Uncle, I know none like I think a home ought to be. The wife will fuss if the husband drops a paper on the floor or puts his shoes in the wrong place and smokes in the wrong room, and he will fuss when the meals are not always on time. Now Uncle, are all homes this way? To me a home should be a place to rest and where the members of the family can be happy and helpful to each other. I am twenty years old, have dark hair, blue eyes, weigh 124 pounds, am five feet three inches tall and fair when I am not tanned by the sun and moon, of which I get my share. I can sew, cook and mend and and help tend the baby. Listen, girls, I feel very sorry for every one of you who lets a boy kiss you every time he wants to. Love to you all. GYNETH BREWER.

Gyneth, your letter shows you to be a young lady of character, good sense and with keen powers of observation. You ask me what I got for Christmas. I got two Christmas cards and a bad cold. Am glad Santa was good to you. Naturally he would be, for, being a man, he would have a crush on the girls and hand them out all the good things and leave male humanity cold on the shelf. You must be proud of your brothers and the service they rendered their country. No training camp and no army can spoil a good man. A bad boy will find just the company he is looking for whether in peace or war. A boy who has had good moral training and is clean and wholesome and has character can go anywhere and come out unscathed. Two or three mothers have written me that the training camps ruined their boys. No such thing. Those kind of boys would be ruined in a Baptist Sunday school. They are hunting ruin. The fault lies more with the mothers than with camps or armies. Water finds its level and so does humanity. There are a million orphans in France, so it is no wonder that your brothers came back with a sad tale of little children, and there are more than a million children starving to death in Central Europe. There were some 1,200 deaths in Vienna in one week, and only eight births, thanks to the lack of nourishment, care, sanitation, etc. Pestilence raging everywhere and no doctors, nurses or medical supplies to help stave off its ravages. Such is the aftermath of war, and when you try and put an end to war, party politicians, who never war except with their mouths, put every obstacle in the way of achieving the greatest of all human objectives. There are plenty of good men in the world, Gyneth, but good men are generally modest and keep in the background while the rascals and troublemakers get on the firing line and make the world a hell for the rest of us. The home is a problem, but don't think there is anything wrong with it because father puts his feet on the mantlepiece, puffs smoke in mother's eyes and drops his shoes in the soup tureen. A little fussing on the part of father or mother merely shows that they are human. When you have to look across the breakfast table at the same old face for fifty years, the monotony of it may get on your nerves and you may do a little fussing, but when the fussing is over you will go around the table and put your arm around the owner of that face and give it a kiss and thank God for all His blessings, especially the blessed privilege of owning that face. The perfect home, inhabited by perfect people, where everything runs like clockwork, where nobody fights and nothing happens and where you have to get a court order before you are permitted to fuss or smile, is a fine imitation of a cemetery but not a home. Heaven preserve us from the home that is a rough-house and a tough-house and also from the home that always seems as if a funeral is about to take place. Let us have a well-managed home, but by all means let it be human, where the people are real joyous realities and not artificial automatons. There should be authority and discipline, system and order in the home, but each unit of the family should be given the fullest opportunity for individual expression, and repression should only be resorted to when the crew mutinies and wants to throw the captain and the mate overboard.

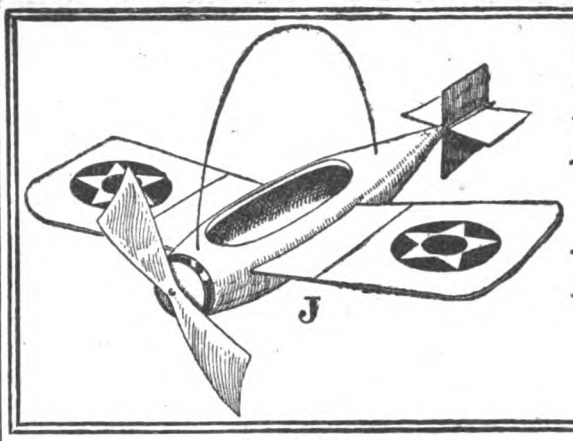
WINCHESTER, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am coming to you for advice. I have brown hair, blue eyes, fair complexion. I am liking a boy of fifteen. He lives about three miles from here. He says he loves me dearly, though he has never been to see me at home. He writes me often and writes the sweetest letters I ever seen. Do you think he loves me? I let him have my Ring to wear and he has had it over a year. I have asked him for it several times but he won't give it to me. I am not a lazy girl. I wash dishes, cook, clean the house and help papa in the store. Love to all. MISS BEETHA ———.

The tragedies of youth, and especially the tragedies of love-lorn youth afford us all an inexhaustible fund of amusement. Lovers may grow old, but love never will and no matter how ossified we get it tickles us all to bits to see the kids getting their first injection of sentimental serum at the hands of our ever youthful friend, Dr. Cupid. Now I'm willing to help you young people who are suffering from the first shock of hydrophobic puppy love, to every extent in my power, but COMFORT cannot start a bureau for the recovery of stolen goods, especially love tokens. If you give a boy a ring, give it to him, don't be an Indian giver and want "dem presents" back. If, on the other hand, you loan a ring, unless you are thoroughly acquainted with the habits, peculiarities and character of the party to whom you trust your property, then it is best for both of you to go to a lawyer and have some arrangement made as to how long your property is to be retained. You might also make the party of the second part deposit ten cents to cover the cost of the ring, for all of you young ladies, as far as my experience goes (and it is some experience, believe me), though you may pay fifteen dollars for shoes, buy all your jewelry in the ten-cent store. The boys are less thrifty and more generous in this respect, for some have even been known to pay as high as fifteen cents, which shows how reckless boys will become when they are vamped by such fair charmers as your fifteen-year-old self. Be careful, however, about depositing that ten cents with the lawyer, for if he ever gets hold of it, it will probably involve you in a three thousand dollar law suit to get it back, then you will most likely have lost both ring and money. The reason this ring gatherer does not visit you in your home is undoubtedly due to the fact that he fears if you once got him in the family parlor, all your friends and relations, armed with hand grenades, shot guns, rifles, flame throwers and poison gas, might make a combined assault on him and remove this priceless piece of jewelry from his possession. Of course, if he loved you he would accede to your slightest request. The fact that he doesn't, makes him a doubtful proposition and you had better sing him a little song on this order:

Give me back my ring again,
Then my love will never cease,
But if my goods I can't obtain,
I'll telephone for the police.



Take my advice, Bertha, and devote the next three years of your life to education, and study domestic science, then a whole carload of worthwhile rings will be presented to you, instead of you handing out rings to the other fellow.

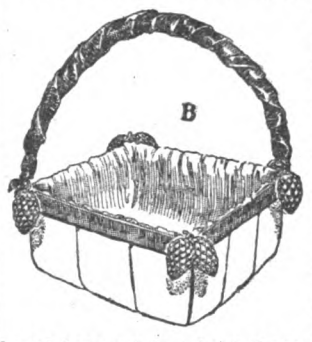
HOME-MADE MAYBASKETS IN PRETTY NEW STYLES

By Ruth Boyce

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

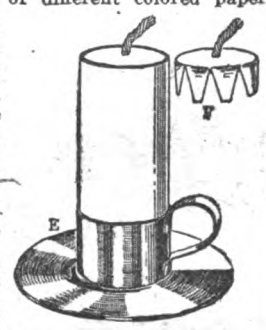


HALF the fun in taking out and hanging Maybaskets at the homes of one's friends is in getting up something original. The expensive baskets are not nearly as much fun, especially the baskets one buys. Anyone with money can step into a shop and buy them, but to make a basket at home, to get up a clever little design, means much—it means the work of thoughtful brain and kind fingers.

Stiff paper, cardboard, colored paper, paint, ribbons, tinsel, gilding, sprigs of artificial flowers and such things that are inexpensive always supply the materials.

One of the oddest Maybaskets I ever saw was a miniature Bunker Hill Monument made of cardboard set on a small square box for a base. The base box opened to hold the sweets or whatever was placed inside. I saw it hanging on a doorknob one May morning and of course could not see inside of it, but I could see how cleverly it was made. The entire outside had evidently been painted with liquid glue and sand sifted over this before the glue hardened. This gave it the appearance of a stone monument and a fine wire bail was added as at A.

A strawberry basket, B, painted gray, with red edges, to which varnished pine cones were wired at each corner, the whole lined with red and the wire bail, wound with red cloth, made a pretty Maybasket. For a very small child the basket could be painted blue and very funny pictures pasted around it.



A candy box was fitted with a slanting roof set on a thin board base cut in a boat shape, windows painted on and one roof hinged on. This made a very presentable Noah's Ark. It was filled with tiny barley candy animals. A wire bail was fastened at the top as at C. A similar box was turned into a miniature doll house and used for a Maybasket. Windows were cut out and paper lace pasted back for curtains and waxed paper back of that for the glass. This contained an assortment of candy dolls. It was opened from the bottom, the house being merely the cover, as at D.

A white bristol-board tube formed a candle for a Maybasket. A cardboard candlestick was added and gilded to look like brass, as at E. The top was made to fit inside, as at F, and a bit of white string put through for the wick. It held candy peppermint sticks.

Make some imitation steel helmets this year, paint them khaki color with a tiny black strap for a bail. For a small boy, fill with toy soldiers. Decorate with tiny flags of the Allies. G shows this form.

A large, square, stout envelope with the flap cut out for a bail is a neat and inexpensive Maybasket. Cover with silverpaint, fasten a sprig of green with sealing wax and fill with whatever desired. At I, show five paper cones or cornucopias. Make them of different colored paper, fasten together at top and bottom. Suspend with a wire loop. Tucked away down in each may be something different, affording five thrilling little surprises.

An aeroplane may be made of cardboard, as illustrated in the heading, a tiny propeller glued on or stuck on with wire so that it will spin. Glue on the wings and suspend front and back with wire. Color a battleship gray with the American aircraft design top and bottom of wings.

A toy balloon may be covered with netting, as at K, and a small basket attached by strings. Fasten to the floor in front of the door by a string and tack, to bottom of basket, and there it will be swaying when your friend opens the door. Try some of these new designs this season. These may help you to think of something quite original yourself.

AMERICAN CEMETERY NEAR VERDUN, FRANCE, WHERE TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND OF OUR SOLDIERS REST.

Where Our Heroes Rest

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

ROW upon row, as far over the slope of the hill as the eye can see; row upon row, to the right and to the left; every little green mound marked by a plain white cross—25,000 of them!

And here rest the heroes of the Argonne Forest drive—a sleep that seems sweet compared with the anxiety and the turmoil through which those who mourn them are passing.

The first cross erected in this little American cemetery in France is to the memory of Leonard Peterson, Private, U. S. Int. In a tragically short time the thousands of others went up to the memory of other boys who had met a similar fate. The cemetery is never without its flowers. It would try the resources of the surrounding country to put flowers on every grave every day, but so many are taken there by the peasantry of the locality that few graves are bare of bud and blossom.

This cemetery is at Romagne, near Verdun. In the foreground are two old barracks. Formerly the scene of military events, and later in many instances of short burial services for the dead, they have now been taken over by the Y. W. C. A. In one is a dormitory, and in the other living and dining quarters. Odd, you say, to have a place like this at the gates of a cemetery? Not at all when you have learned why they are there.

As soon as the ban was lifted, mothers, fathers, wives and sweethearts were permitted to go to France to visit this sacred piece of ground. The great majority spoke no tongue but English; they had not crossed the water before; the trip would have been momentous if taken with happy hearts, but under these circumstances it was nothing short of tragic.

They reached France, a grave and troubled host; to find the town nearest to the cemetery, to find the cemetery, to find the grave—not many were equal to it without the assistance of those who were there, having made the journey before them.

It was to make this ordeal lighter for heavy hearts that the Y. W. C. A. opened a Hostel for relatives of the dead right at the cemetery gates. Here the visitors find a home waiting for them; are put under the guidance of one who knows the cemetery as she would know one that grew, oh, so much more slowly, in her village back in America. Every relative is taken direct to the grave she is seeking; every visitor to the cemetery is comforted, and sustained, just as far in as sympathy and material aid can help. And when the relative turns to start "back home," it is to find the beginning of the journey made as easy as the ending had been hard.

The relatives remain at the Hostel over night; some remain for several weeks. "We want to be near our boy all we can," said one mother. "Our window overlooks his grave, and my husband and I are growing more reconciled to losing him since we have been here; it is such a peaceful scene. We say good night to him before going to bed, and both of us sleep better knowing that his sleep is so peaceful. We have lost that terrible association of his death with the roar of battle since coming here."

patient, too), doesn't buy very much today and it would take 90,000 dimes, or $9,000, to buy the house Uncle Charlie lives in, though a few years ago it could have been purchased for $6,000. See what a lot of money we've lost by being so slow. Of course Uncle Charlie had rather have 90,000 dimes than 9,000 dollars just the same as any man had rather have 90,000 than 9,000 friends. I'm sure he has that many friends but they belong to the careless people who never do today what they can put off until tomorrow—I'm apt to be that way myself at times. Anyway, "dimes are slow and time is fleeting" and Uncle Charlie is 57 years old and if he is to have an earthly home it is time he had it. He has builded well here so that his future home is assured (and we can't contribute even a nickel to that—no matter how much we'd like to) but in the meantime the $3,547.33 given by 6,023 of COMFORT's readers is in the bank and the interest it is drawing isn't noticeable compared with the rent he is paying. We were all enthusiastic about putting this project over the top and Uncle Charlie is deeply grateful to all who have striven to place him beyond the reach of profiteering landlords but not until the full amount necessary for the purchase of the modest home in which he resides (and it is a physical impossibility for him to move) has been donated, can he receive the benefit from the generous efforts of those who have already done their bit to make this most laudable undertaking a success. This isn't a job for the other fellow but for all of us who appreciate what Uncle Charlie through the years has been doing for all of us.—Ed.

WILLOW SPRINGS, MO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I do not know the number of COMFORT's subscribers but I wish it were possible to write each a personal letter. However, this is the next best way of reaching them. I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years, though not continuously, and but recently have learned of Uncle Charlie's physical disability. His letters have been of special interest, especially all through the world war, and I think truly he is one of our greatest hero soldiers, one hundred per cent American and I suggest we decorate him with flowers on May 30th, in form of one dollar each. God will return us two for one in every instance. Let's give it with cheer and good will to a bed-ridden brother. It will be so easy to enclose a dollar bill, or more if you wish, and mail it to his address—Charles Noel Douglas, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, N. Y., or send it to Uncle Charlie, Care COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Let's not forget the date and be early rather than late with our "flowers." It will show our appreciation of his finely written talks, any one of which is well worth a dollar. Ten-cent showers are very well but a dollar shower is ten times better. All of us have sympathy for the afflicted; let us back it up with our dollars.

I know what affliction means, having experienced same since birth. Am near Uncle Charlie's age and happy, though married. I love the Ozark country of southern Missouri. It is indeed God's country.

Sincerely, BOX 428.

MINNESOTA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I love the Sisters' Corner and look forward and wait for COMFORT each month.

I'll tell you something of my life. I am twenty-two years of age and single. I had a soldier sweetheart in France, as most of the girls had. We were engaged for three years; he served one year in France and came back to the U. S. last August. We were to be married in February. Later in the summer I left my city home and am now on a beautiful farm with my sister. While out here I met a young man, another returned soldier, and the first time I met him I knew I never loved the other boy. I broke the engagement with my first sweetheart and am promised to the second one whom I love with all my heart. My first sweetheart is broken hearted and pleads for me to come to him. The pity I feel for him is near breaking my own heart but I can never love him. Sometimes I almost think I ought to go back to the first love. Sisters, what shall I do? Should I go back to him, still loving the second one? No one seems to want to give me advice. They tell me to fight my own battles as I might reproach them later, but it is advice I want and it would help me.

The first is a city boy, a mechanic by trade; the second is a farmer lad. I have been a city girl all my life but love the wonderful, fresh, green country, with its wholesome air and golden waving grain fields. Then, too, how delicious the sweet, yellow butter tastes fresh from the churn. In the city you have to be content with what you buy.

I will leave my address with Mrs. Wilkinson if anyone should write to me.

Wishing the sisters happiness and good health,
FAIR LOCKS.

Fair Locks.—It is easy to understand why none of your friends want to advise you on such an all-important question and I hope you get good advice from the sisters. "Golden waving grain fields" are as pleasing to the eye as "sweet yellow butter, fresh from the churn" is pleasing to the palate but have you ever considered the labor involved before grain fields reach that golden waving state, as well as the labor afterward? Ever try cooking for a crew of hungry threshers? Caring for the cream, churning it and making the butter into prints, as well as washing the churn, isn't the easiest thing in the world, either. I know all about it. It is well to consider these things first and whether your love for the farmer boy is big enough to make play of the hard work on a farm.—Ed.

WISCONSIN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I want to sit at Mrs. Wilkinson's feet and look up into her kind eyes and tell her all my troubles and joys. I really haven't many troubles and everyone has joys if they look for them.

I wish all the dear sisters might see the beautiful sunset I am seeing. Overhead the sky is grey with clouds but in the west the sun's face fairly shines and the glow all about it is pink with here and there a touch of yellow and blue. It is all very lovely and I am so glad I am alive, glad that spring is coming and that life is bright with hope. I really don't see how anyone can be sad and gloomy, but, of course, I don't understand everyone's troubles.

A year ago I married one of the best men in the world, and I didn't know how to bake bread and even cooking potatoes was rather a puzzle and sisters, my first pumpkin pie! I peeled the pumpkin, cut it in tiny squares and dumped it into the pie crust and put it in the oven to bake. I shall never forget that pie! That was only one of many lessons I had to learn.

To the girls in their 'teens, I say, stay single until you are in your twenties. My married life is happy but I did not seem to understand that I would have to give up a lot of things when I was married. It is hard for me to give up going to dances and parties, but Hubby objects to them. He was a soldier and was in France and England. Sometimes it seems that he is selfish not to let me have a good time, or is it I who am selfish?

How many sisters love cats? I have a dear little yellow-and-white kitten and a bird and if it were not for these dear little friends I would be more lonely than I am as my husband is away all day.

I will tell you how I look and say good by. I am seventeen years old, five feet, two inches tall, dark hair and eyes and have a stub nose.

Oceans of love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters—and the few brothers. Mrs. Wilkinson, I'll feel terribly hurt if you don't write something below my letter.

BOBBY.

Bless you, Bobby, of course I'll write something below your letter and I'll tell you a secret for you are still young enough to enjoy secrets; all children do, and you are hardly more than a child. Listen to this: You aren't the only stupid person for one time, years ago, when my chum's mother went out for the afternoon she told her daughter and me to "watch the bread." We obeyed religiously, stopping our play every few minutes to "watch" it. In the course of the afternoon we found that it was rising so high it would be likely to run over the sides of the pan. We were much worried over this so after much debate procured a clean dish towel which we pinned tightly around the pan and bread dough and said, "Now let it go just as high as it wants to." Isn't that just as foolish as your pumpkin pie? To be sure, we were very young but we should have known better. We are still as good friends as in days of childhood and have laughed many times at the way we "watched" the bread. Please don't tell the sisters about this for I'm a little bit ashamed of it.

I am glad you haven't any troubles and hope

and was lying, without sound or movement, upon the littered asphalt of the street. Arthur Preston, his faculties absorbed by the danger of the swaying wall, did not realize that his aunt had fallen out, and that he was speeding away from her.

Then, under the impetus of an explosion near at hand, the huge wall of brick shook more ominously than before. The soldiers did not seem to realize the awful predicament of Mrs. Preston, who lay at the very base of the tottering ruins.

With a despairing cry, Beryl dashed forward, her little feet flying across the debris-strewn thoroughfare. Tonita would have seized her, had she not been so quick; the Mexicana called wildly for the brave girl to return; and then, seeing that she was bent upon risking her life to rescue the woman who had treated her so cruelly, Tonita plunged after her.

CHAPTER XXVI.

A BRAVE DEED.

Beryl, when she saw the awful danger that threatened Mrs. Preston, had thought only that she was Neil's mother; and that, notwithstanding her cruel pride, her life was dear to her son. Tonita, on the other hand, thought only of Beryl.

The homeless people, standing about the edge of the little park, gazed with horror-stricken eyes at the tragic scene. Two lovely young girls were hurling themselves into what seemed like certain death. The smoke-blackened wall shivered and surged, now forward, now back; every moment it seemed as though it must precipitate itself into the thoroughfare.

Men who had looked with calloused hearts upon the threatened collision of the automobile now gave vent to hoarse cries of fear and warning; women screamed, and the soldiers, realizing when too late that a woman had fallen from one of the vehicles, stood gazing in mute helplessness at the fluttering, flying figures of the girls.

Beryl was first to reach the prostrate form of the unconscious woman. She called to Mrs. Preston wildly, but, of course, no answer could come from those proud, silent lips which had wounded the rescuer so keenly the evening before.

Beryl stooped to clutch the limp form and drag it to safety. At that moment Tonita came breathlessly to her side. There was no time for words. Tonita realized what must be done, and promptly lent her willing aid. Between them the two rescuers dragged their unconscious burden from the dangerous spot. They were almost out of the zone of peril when a soldier dashed in, caught Mrs. Preston in his arms, and staggered to the edge of the park.

Nor was this accomplished an instant too soon. The soldier had not yet laid the rescued woman on the sward at the edge of the refugee camp when there came a frightful crash, and the bricks and stones of the wall deluged the street. A small hill of masonry covered the very spot where Mrs. Preston had been thrown from the automobile!

"A heroic deed!" cried the handsome young officer who had been overseeing the distribution of supplies. He had leaped from the wagon and had dashed to the place where Beryl and Tonita, weak and faint after their brave task, had sunk upon one of the park benches.

"And to think," spoke up a gray-haired man, trembling with excitement, "that the work should have been left to two frail girls!"

"Who are they?" came from every side. "Does any one know who they are?"

This question, naturally, could not be answered. Hardly any two of the refugees had had much acquaintance with each other up to the time their lots had been cast in that small park; so it was not to be supposed that they would know the names of two wanderers who had reached the camp after nightfall.

The young officer bent over the girls and offered them a tin cup of water.

"You saved the woman's life," said he, his eyes glowing with admiration. "But for your quick work she would have been buried under an avalanche of masonry. I should like to report this, if you will give me your names."

The red mantled Beryl's face.

"Please say nothing about it, sir," said Beryl. "We do not wish to have our names known."

"Do you know the woman whose life you saved?"

"I know who she is, that is all. She is Mrs. Burton Preston, of Denver. The automobile from which she was thrown belongs to Mr. Arthur Preston, of Nob Hill."

"Ah, then you are friends of the family?" queried the officer, struck by the influential names he had just heard.

"No, we are not friends of the Prestons," answered Beryl.

"We would not be friends of Mrs. Preston if we could!" spoke up Tonita warmly.

The officer looked at the Mexicana with a faint smile.

"And yet," he murmured, "you both would risk your lives for her."

"How is she?" asked Beryl. "Is she very badly hurt?"

Some of the women among the refugees were ministering to Mrs. Preston. At this question from Beryl one of them looked around.

"No, she is not severely hurt," said the woman. "She was stunned by her fall from the car, but will quickly recover."

"I am thankful for that," murmured Beryl, thinking of Neil.

"Fortune is more than kind to these people who are born with gold spoons in their mouths," said Tonita, who had no kindly feeling whatever for Mrs. Preston. "Yes, blessings are always showered upon those who do not need them."

The young officer seemed amused at the beautiful Mexicana's display of temper.

"Hello!" he exclaimed suddenly, looking up one of the streets. "Here comes the Preston automobile back again. It must have gone around the block."

He stepped out into the street and met the car as Arthur Preston halted it close to the place where the women were working over his aunt.

"Where is my aunt, the lady who was with me?" cried Arthur Preston.

His face was blanched, and his apprehensive eyes were on the heap of debris at the place where the wall had fallen.

"Didn't you know that she was thrown from the car?" demanded the officer.

"I did not dream of such a thing!" cried Arthur Preston. "My aunt, man!" he implored. "Tell me—tell me the worst!"

"Your aunt fell on the very spot where that mass of masonry now lies," said the officer. "That she did not meet a horrible fate is due entirely to the daring of two young girls. At the risk of their own lives they rushed forward and dragged your aunt to safety."

"And is my aunt alive? Where is she?"

The crowd parted so that he could see Mrs. Preston and those about her. Arthur leaped down from the machine and hurried to his aunt's side.

"She's revivin', sir," said one of the women, who, with her rough, toil-hardened hands, was chafing the delicate temples of the rich Mrs. Preston. "She'll be able to talk to ye in a minute, sir."

An expression of intense relief crossed Arthur Preston's face as he turned away.

"It was all the result of a frightful mistake!" he exclaimed, addressing the officer. "I did not hear the soldiers' warning until I was past the danger line, and it was better then to go on than to turn back. The other automoble came upon me with the swiftness of a thunderbolt, and I had no idea my aunt had been thrown from her seat by the jar. She did not utter a single cry—I am certain of that. If she had, I would have discovered at once what was wrong."

The next moment he seemed to think of the two girls and what they had done.

"You say," he proceeded eagerly, "that two young women saved Mrs. Preston?"

"Yes," the soldier answered.

"What they have done this day is something that shall never be forgotten, nor pass without reward. Please bring the young women to me. I would have my aunt know how she is indebted to them just as soon as she is able to realize what has happened."

The officer went to the bench where he had left the girls; but the bench was unoccupied. The girls had vanished. He looked around through the crowd, and called upon others to look, but the search was fruitless.

"The young ladies," said the officer, returning to Mr. Preston, "are not to be found; they have mysteriously vanished."

"Who were they?" asked Arthur Preston.

"I can't tell you," was the reply; "they refused to give their names."

"Does any one know who those young ladies were?" cried Arthur Preston.

There was a moment's silence; then a poor woman with a tear-stained face pushed closer to him through the crowd.

"They were in my tent along with me, sir, last night," the woman answered. "When they came, I woke up, and thought mebby it was my daughter, who has been lost ever since the earthquake. I heard 'em talkin' a little, and one called the other Beryl. That's the only name I heard."

"Beryl!" Arthur Preston started as though stung. "Describe that girl to me," he went on to the officer excitedly.

"She was a girl of rare loveliness," answered the young officer, "if she is the one I believe the woman refers to. She had waving golden hair, violet-blue eyes——"

"It is she!" gasped Arthur Preston, with a startled, bewildered look in the direction of his aunt. "What a strange combination of circumstances!" he murmured to himself. "I will give five hundred dollars," he called, "to the person who will find those two girls and bring them to me!"

But, although he waited for half an hour at the edge of the park, while men, boys, and even women, scattered all over it in quest of the two girls, yet his generous offer bore no fruit.

By that time his aunt had so far recovered that she could be assisted into the car and the journey continued. Arthur Preston left with the officer the address of his lawyer, who lived in San Rafael; and the lawyer was to be communicated with in case the girls could be found later. Then, with Mrs. Preston leaning white and listless against the leather cushions of the rear seat, the automobile sped away.

CHAPTER XXVII.

A CHANCE MEETING.

"We are wreck and stray, we are cast away,
Poor, battered old hulks and spars,
But we hope and pray, on the Judgment Day,
We will strike it, up there in the stars.
Though battered and old, our hearts are bold,
Yet oft do we repine
For the days of old,
For the days of gold—
For the days of Forty-nine."

An old melodeon had been moved from a house into a neighboring square. A crowd of white-haired men surrounded it, while a younger one of their number played an accompaniment and the rest sang. There was something eery in the effect. Neil, wandering aimlessly, yet ever with his one absorbing purpose in mind, drew near to the group and listened.

"Where the rabbits play, and the quail all day
Pipes on, on the chaparral hill,
A few more days, and the last of us lays
His pick aside, and is still.
Though battered and old, our hearts are bold,
Yet oft do we repine
For the days of old,
For the days of gold—
For the days of Forty-nine."

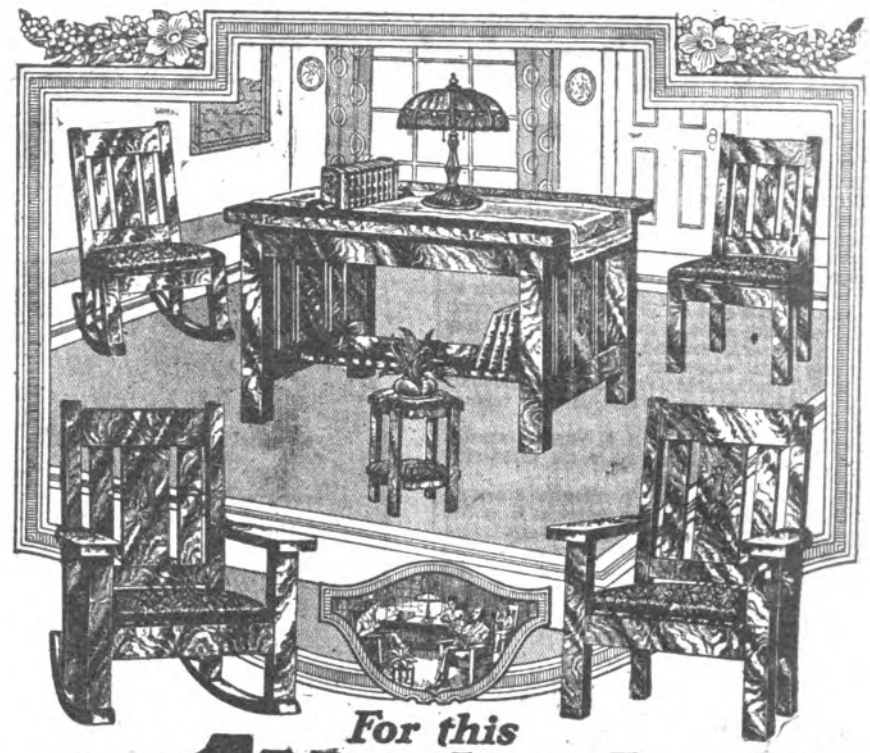
Neil joined in the refrain with a queer tugging at his heartstrings. The song finished, he thought hopefully of George Gate Park, the Presidio, Port Mason, and then he turned his steps westward to carry his search in directions hitherto untried.

"I will find her," he kept saying to himself. "I will—I must find her!" He had repeated the words over and over the day before, just as he was repeating them now. And if despair came, he always saw or heard something that pushed the benumbing cloud aside and revived his drooping spirits.

The constant tide of refugees swept through the dismantled streets toward the Market Street ferry; Neil seemed to be the only one who was pushing in an opposite direction. He kept on tirelessly, proceeding from one refugee camp to another.

During his wanderings he reverted wrathfully to his mother's heartlessness in keeping himself and Beryl apart. She had called at the house to obtain news of him. He could well imagine what sort of reception had been accorded her, and how she had been sent away. His heart overflowed with bitterness, and his strong hands clenched in a fury of impotent desire.

If he could only be with his fair young bride! If he could only shield her from the cruel misfortunes which threatened every one in that distressed and ruined city! That was all he thought of. His mother had ordered him from her sight, and wished never to see his face again.



His sorrow fought with his anger; but he bowed to his proud mother's will, feeling sure that her disposition would change when she learned that Beryl, so far from being poor, was as wealthy as any of the Prestons. The precious packet which he carried with him would establish his dear one's rights to riches which, as yet, she did not dream of.

Eunice Bartholdt, to whom his mother had referred in their heated interview, was the daughter of a rich brewer. Eunice had ambitions, and if to her wealth she could add the prestige of the Preston name no society star in all Denver could have competed with her. Eunice had planned an elaborate campaign for the conquest of Neil Preston, and she had lived to see her scheming set at naught by a mere working girl! While she remained in Denver, eating her heart out with jealous envy, Mrs. Preston had gone to San Francisco to find Neil, and to plead, for a last time, in Eunice Bartholdt's behalf. All this Neil learned later, but even then a glimmering of the truth had dawned upon him.

While busy with his thoughts, his eyes roved restlessly as he walked. Nothing escaped his vigilance, although his mind now and again would dwell on matters but indirectly connected with Beryl. Suddenly his glance rested on a form in the moving throng about him. Recognition between him and the man was instant and mutual. The man, with an averting of the eyes, sought to drift away and skulk from sight. But in half-a-dozen steps Neil was upon him and had his arm in a firm grip.

"I want a word with you, Trenwyck!" said Neil sternly. "This way!"

New Design for Knitted Spring Slip-On

Knitted Slip-On Sweater

IF material of the same weight as Scotch is knitted with No. 6 celluloid needle, finished garment will be about size 36; of Shetland or other fine wool directions as given, will result in a smaller size unless knitted on a coarser needle. A pair of No. 14 steel needles will be needed for ribbing.

Cast on 76 sts. Work is begun on bottom of the back. Knit 5 ribs or 10 ribs, now on each side of the work; always knit first 7 stitches and in between k 1 row and p 1 row. Continue in this way until one has nine ribs on each side. K and p alternate rows for next three or more inches according to length one wishes garment below the waistline.

With steel needles k 4, p 4, repeat across. Next p 4, k 4, repeat these two rows until ribbing measures three inches.

On No. 6 needles k and p alternate row as before until back of sweater reaches a point two inches below the neck, now always k and p on first and last 16 sts of each row and across the center 44 sts always knit. When seven ribs are formed on 44 sts, k or p 16 sts as usual, k 7 sts, bind off 30 sts, k 7 sts and finish the row as it was begun.

For Shoulder

K 4, p 4, k 4, p 4, k 7, turn k 11, p 4, k 4, p 4. Repeat these two rows until one has two inches of ribbing and 7 knitted sts on the neck side of the work. Now k 5 ribs or 10 rows on the 23 sts. Next 6 rows always knit 7 sts on neck edge and k and p alternate rows on remaining 16 sts, as shown in our illustration.

Hereafter on neck edge always cast on 1 st, turn and k 1 additional st on each row. After 9 sts have been added cast on 2 sts for three rows. Work other shoulder in the same manner, join, having 76 sts in all. Cast on 4 sts for underarm, k and p alternate rows on 27 sts, always knit across center sts until five ribs are formed, k and p last 23 sts, cast on 14 sts, turn.

After finishing five ribs across center k and p from side to side until work measures top of ribbing on the back, folding the work on the neckline. Rib to match back and finish the work below with knitted ribs on the side and bottom. Bind off loosely.

Pick up sts around arm-scye, k and p for four inches, then k 2 tog at end of every other row until point three inches below elbow is reached. One should discontinue decreasing when one has a number of sts which can be divided by 4 Knit five ribs, three inches for cuff by knitting 4, purling 5, knit five ribs and bind off.

Join the side seams from the top of the knitted ribs on the bottom of the front and back.

KNITTED SLIP-ON SWEATER.

American Flag Tatted in Colors

BY SARAH A. R. ELLIS.

Materials: No. 70 tatting thread and shuttle. Finished flag measures about six and one-half inches wide by ten and one-half long.

2nd row.—Using white, make rings of the same size, joining to center picots of rings in first row, and making the same length.

3rd row.—Same as 1st in red and connect to 2nd row.

4th row.—Same as 2nd row in white and connect to 3rd row.

5th row.—Same as 1st and 3rd.

6th row.—Same as 2nd and 4th.

7th row.—Same as 1st, 3rd and 5th.

Here make the white stars with the blue around in the background. Use the blue as spool thread and white on the shuttle for rings. Make a ring of 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, with blue spool thread make ch 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 white ring connected to center p of first ring, ch as before, repeat until you have five white rings and fasten at the base of the first ring. Turn work. Ch with blue, make a second star same as first. Fasten to the base of the first ring of each star in the same way as one joins to a picot. Turn work. Ch as before, make 3rd star connect to first by p of 2nd ch, and 3rd or 4th p of the first ch. Continue until there are seven or eight stars in the first two rows, then make two more rows with 8 stars on one side and seven on the other. The next row of star insertion is made in the same way and connected with the previous row as directed.

This does not make the block of stars quite the required size, so make a row of blue insertion and connect with the stars on one side and the stripes on the other. Rings for this insertion are 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, join, 2 d s, 1 p, 2 d s, close, make 2nd ring and join to stripes, make 3rd ring and join to 1st ring and stars. Repeat until square of stars and stripes are all connected.

8th row.—White stripes, full length of flag made same as 2nd row.

9th row.—Same as first in red (full length of flag, about ten and one-half inches.)

10th row.—Same as 8th, in white.

11th row.—Same as the 9th, in red.

12th row.—Same as the 8th, in white.

13th row.—Same as the 9th, in red.

For the outer edge of the stars take blue on spool and shuttle and ch 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, and connect all around, in the larger spaces, ch 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close. This edge is put on the top and the side next to the staff.

Staff holder is made as follows: In white make a ring of 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close; take spool thread, ch 10 d s, make ring same as first and so on connecting to the staff side of flag. As you make, starting at the bottom connect 1st ring in end of red bar 2nd and 3rd ring connect in 2nd p as you go up the staff 4th and 5th in 3rd p and so on, if you should want to insert a larger staff than the 10 d s would allow make chains longer.

Crocheted Portiere

Materials: Carpet warp and No. 1 bone hook.

Three slightly different medallions are combined in this design, as shown in our illustration. This pattern can easily be made to fit any sized door by adding to the width. To exactly copy one will need twelve large square medallions, five small square ones and end medallions. These with the tassels and rings complete the design.

Large Square Medallion

Ch 20, turn.

1st row.—1 d c in 9th st from hook, ch 2, sk 2, 1 d c, repeat making 3 more sps or 5 in all, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—5 sps, ch 5, turn.

Repeat last row 3 times. This will give one 5 rows of 5 sps each.

Next, work completely around this square as follows: In last sp of 5th line make 3 s c, 1 s c between rows, 3 s c in sp ending 4th row, 1 s c between rows, 3 s c in sp, 1 s c between rows, ch 12, turn, sl st to s c, between 2nd and 3rd sps, turn under ch 12, work, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c in sp end 2nd row, 1 s c between row, 3 s c in corner sp, ch 7, turn, sl st to 2nd p on ch 12, ch 7, sl st to 4th p, ch 7, sl st to corner of square, turn, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c under ch 7, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, ch 3, 3 s c, under 2nd ch 7, while under 3rd ch 7 one makes only 2 p as under first ch.

Second Side of Square

Work singles in first 3 sps as directed for first side, ch 12, singles and picots, and finish the same as in first side.

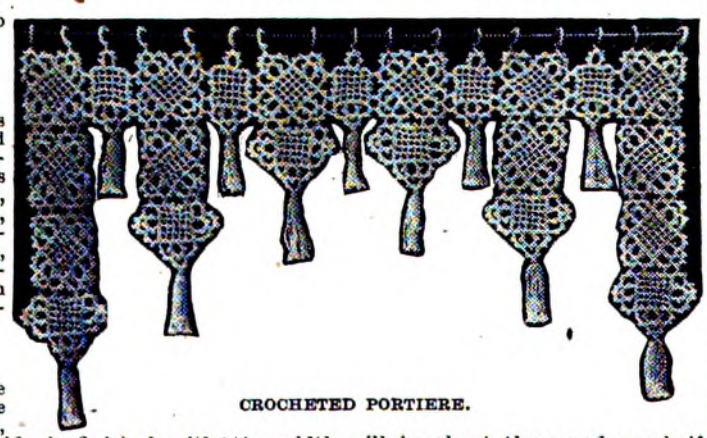
Repeat on other two sides and break thread.

Small Square Medallion

First 5 rows are same as in large medallion, and one side has the same finish, on 2nd side make 3 s c in corner sp, 1 p of ch 3, 3 s c in next sp, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 3 s c, 1 p, 6 s c in corner sp, 1 s c between rows, 3 s c, repeat to next corner, 6 s c, 1 p and finish this last side same as opposite with 4 p.

End Medallions

The center and three sides are the same as the large square medallion, while the fourth side is finished with singles and 4 picots as in the small square medallion.



The joining can be made as the work is done, but is easier to handle if joined afterwards by needle and thread. In the first strip join 3 large square medallions by third picots of center chs on one side and next picots of side chs to corresponding picots of next medallion.

To the same picots of the medallion join an end medallion by first picot of side ch and first picot on the fourth side of the end medallion. Sk 2 sps and join the next two to correspond to first side.

Add a tassel to center picot of end medallion. Join small square medallion by first p to first p of ch on side of first large medallion. Sk 2 medallions on each square and join the next 4, or 2 and 2 p which will be opposite each other. Finish with tassel.

Make the balance of the portiere and join in the same way.

Crochet over rings of cord of the proper size to fit the pole used.

CROCHETED PORTIERE.

Crocheted Purse

Here are simple directions for crocheting a purse with wool or silk. Commence with 37 chain, always taking three chain to turn. Turn and work one treble in each chain, turn and continue the same till you have the required length. Remember that the work has to be doubled from beginning to end to form two sides.

When you have the length desired, start decreasing one stitch at each end until all the stitches are done. This point forms the turnover flap.

Double the work and sew neatly on the wrong side, turn back and sew a patent fastener to the under side of the flap, which fastens to the purse itself.

If you wish to wear the purse around your neck, fasten your thread at one end of the purse and work 80 chain and attach the opposite side. Double crochet around a brass ring catching it into the 80 chain in the center Pass the cord to go around the neck through this ring and the purse is completed.

Wide Filet Insertion

This insertion is suitable for towels, scarfs or runners. If made of No. 70 mercerized cotton the width will be about three and one-half inches. The motif is conventional and very attractive.

Begin with ch 75 sts, turn.

1st row.—23 sps, ch 5, turn.

2nd row.—11 sps, 1 blk (4 d c), 11 sps, ch 5, turn.

3rd row.—10 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, 10 sps, ch 5, turn.

4th row.—9 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 9 sps, ch 5, turn.

5th row.—5 sps, 1 blk, 3 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 3 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, ch 5, turn.

6th row.—6 sps, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 1 sp, 2 blks, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

7th row.—6 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, 2 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

8th row.—8 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

9th row.—4 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 3 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

10th row.—3 sps, 5 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

11th row.—2 sps, 1 blk, 5 sps, 7 blks, 5 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, ch 5, turn.

12th row.—3 sps, 5 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 1 sp, 5 blks, 3 sps, ch 5, turn.

13th row.—4 sps, 3 blks, 2 sps, 5 blks, 2 sps, 3 blks, 4 sps, ch 5, turn.

14th row.—8 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 2 sps, 1 blk, 8 sps, ch 5, turn.

15th row.—6 sps, 2 blks, 2 sps, 1 blk, 1 sp, 1 blk, 2 sps, 2 blks, 6 sps, ch 5, turn.

16th row.—Same as last row.

17th row.—Same as 5th row.

18th row.—Same as 5th row.

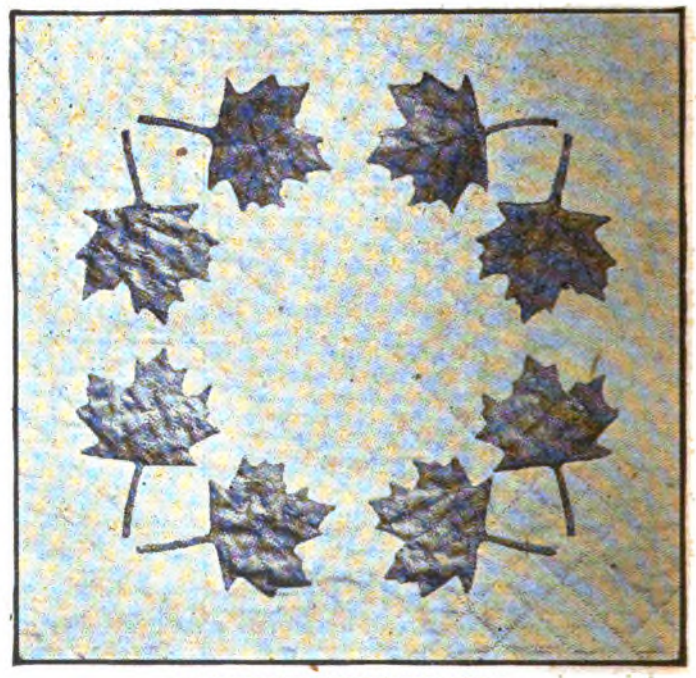
Next rows all of 23 sps until work measures an inch or two as desired, then repeat motif. For scarf ends an addition may be made to this as needed making and fixing a raised sort of rose to the center of each motif. For this work as follows: ch 3, join, 6 s c in ring, next round 12 s c, next 18 s c, continue working until one-half inch in diameter, then 1 round of 1 s c in each s c, this will tend to draw in or slightly cup the work. Hold in place by filling center with French knots of white or pink if one cares to use another color.

Making Irish Crochet

A clever woman, who supports herself by making Irish crochet lace at odd moments, always learns to make the new patterns first by doing the work with a coarse hook and fine wrapping cord.

When thoroughly familiar with the intricacies of the pattern, she can do the work with fine thread without danger to her eyesight and much more rapidly than it could be done if she were working on an entirely new design.



The coarse lace made of the wrapping cord is used to trim linen and cretonne covers for the bureau and tables.

When she wishes to copy a new pattern from a small illustration in a book or magazine, she uses a powerful magnifying reading glass. Then the stitches can be counted without any trouble or without danger of straining her eyes.

Filet and cross-stitch work are treated in the same manner.

Maple Leaf Block, Quilted

Cut two pieces of white muslin eighteen inches square, one square of wadding a little smaller, which place between the muslin

MAPLE LEAF DESIGN FOR QUILT

squares. Baste them together and then quilt. The maple leaves are cut from green material allowing an edge to be turned under, and sewed to the quilted muslin, using the old-time hemstitch, the leaves quilted—with green thread, stitches not to show at back—to represent the veins. Wadding may be cut smaller than the leaves and placed underneath them to give a raised effect

Things to Embroider

To the girl who embroiders the whole realm of pretty summer things is open. Embroidered linen dresses are still fashionable for summer wear. So are embroidered hats, shirtwaists, jabots, belts, shoes, parasols, etc.

An embroidered linen dress sounds like a huge undertaking, but there are lovely designs, with coarse thread, that can be completed in two or three evenings. The stamping should not be done till the dress is finished.

The fichu is a dress accessory easily fashioned by home dressmakers, and delightfully pretty, no matter what its material, so long as it is soft and drapes nicely. A fichu of thin lawn looks charming tucked into the belt of the everyday frock, and a chiffon fichu, edged with baby width satin ribbon, worn with a passe evening frock, makes a new and even prettier affair out of it than it was originally. If you have a cameo brooch with which to pin it, all the better. Old-fashioned brooches that have been lying around in boxes for years are in fashion again. Burnish them up, put new pins on them, and be the envy of all while wearing them.

Instead of buying new things, the home dressmaker should set her mind and her fingers flying amid the old ones, for this is the season of seasons for remodeling, for bringing out old treasures and adapting old styles at home to dresses worn two years ago or thereabouts.

Make 3 more rings in the same way, as close to each other as possible and joined to each other by the side picots. Also join the center p of the second ring to center p of first ring in last row. Close after fourth ring, tie securely and cut thread. Join center p of first of next group to center p of third ring of first group. Join center p of second ring to p of third ring in last row. Repeat making 7 groups of 4 rings each, joining the second ring of the seventh group to center p of first corner ring. Next make 4 rings joined to each other and to last group of 4 rings. Repeat turning each corner in this way and joining the rings to every other ring in the last row as directed.

CHILD'S SQUARE TATTED NECK YOKE.

d s, 1 ring, 3 d s, join to ring in seventh row, 3 d s, 1 ring, 7 d s, 2 rings, 10 d s, join to center p of end ring in seventh row, 10 d s, 1 clover leaf. Now make leaves and chains as on neck edge, joining each ch excepting the first to two rings. At the corner after making a clover leaf, ch 14, join to p of first corner ring, ch 10, 2 rings close together each of 10 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, 1 p, 10 d s, close. Joining second ring to the first ch 10 d s, join to second corner ring, ch 10 d s, join to next ring, ch 10 d s, 1 clover leaf. Repeat, turning each corner in this way.

A pretty effect may be obtained in using this pattern by combining two colors, using one shade for both edges and the row of 4 ring medallions, and white for the balance.

Collars, cuffs and pockets on little dresses are very pretty trimmed with a colored edge of tatted rings; or if one prefers crocheting the following will give the right amount of color: Use No. 70 or 80 crochet cotton and make 1 s c in material, ch 5, 1 s c in material, repeat, break thread. Join with s c and under first ch 5, make 7 s c, repeat.

Embroidery Pointers

Use your silk in the direction the twist runs, to secure even, smooth work. After drawing a thread from the skein, pass it lightly between the thumb and forefinger, to ascertain this, and then insert the thread in the eye of the needle so that the twist seems to run down from the needle. If the opposite end be inserted, the thread is drawn through the linen against the twist, which causes roughness and knots.

Never knot thread, as this gives the work a rough appearance. Fasten the thread by running it in the cloth, or by sewing it over and over on some portion of the goods that is to be covered by the embroidery.

When you are finishing a needle of silk, fasten it in the same way and clip the silk short, or it will work to the surface and later make the work look ragged. Biting silk pulls it and gives it a drawn look, always cut it.

In working a leaf or petal, the part which laps under should be worked first. You may begin in the center and work out, at the base and work up, or at the edge and work in. A simple way is to begin at the apex of the leaf or petal, and then, after making a line of stitches down the center, work to the right until the right half is finished; then return to the apex and work the left side in the same way. In work that requires delicate shading, work up from the base on the whole petal or leaf. It is better to put in veinings last, over the finished leaf, rather than outlining them first and filling in around them.

To make outlines distinct, so that leaves and petals will not seem to run together, outline the edges. The work is thus raised, and lights and shadows are shown better than by the flat treatment. If a still more highly raised work be desired, you must pad with white cotton or silk underneath.

To make shading artistic, so that there is no sign where one color ends and another begins, run the stitches of one color well up into the other, and do this unevenly, so as to leave no decided line where they meet.

SPORT HAT IN TATTED DESIGN.

Girl's Tatted Sport Hat

BY MABEL DAVIS.

Materials: White or colored tatting thread and shuttles.

Work is begun in the center of the crown by making a ring of 12 picots each separated by 2 d s. Draw up close, tie and cut thread.

2nd round.—Make ring 4 d s, join to p of center ring, 4 d s, close. Turn, make ring 4 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 4 d s and close. Turn and make a small ring like the first and join to next p of center ring. Repeat, working around center ring in this way and cut or leave the thread long enough to turn,

3rd round.—1 ring 4 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close, small ring, 4 d s, join to p of last round, 4 d s, close. Now leaving thread three-eighths inch long make 4 d s, join to p of next ring, 4 d s, close. Repeat around.

4th round.—Ring 4 d s, join to thread between small rings. Widen top of crown by making 2 small rings in every fourth thread in this round. Repeat around.

5th round.—Ring 4 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close, ring 4 d s, join to thread 4 d s. Make 2 small rings in about every second thread, or if this makes the crown too full every third thread.

6th round.—4 d s, join to p of large ring, 4 d s, close, leave sufficient thread and repeat.

Three rounds of small rings joined as before, then a round of large and small rings. This completes the crown.

Side Crown

Ring 4 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close. Turn, ring 4 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, close. Turn large ring as before joining p to p of first ring. Turn, make 4 d s, join to p in small ring, 4 d s, close. Repeat till there are as many large rings as there are in crown of hat.

Make opposite side of beading in the same way, having a group of 4 small rings joined in the center.

2nd round.—1 small ring join to p of large ring, leave thread three-eighths inch, small ring join to p of next large ring. Repeat around.

Brim

Widen by making 2 rings in every 3rd thread. Then 4 rounds of rings without widening. Next round widen in every fourth or fifth thread. Again 4 rounds plain. Repeat, making the brim as wide as desired, then finish the edge with round of small and large rings, alternating, joining the large rings to each other.

Crocheted Edging

This pattern can be made of either one or two rows as shown in our illustration, works up very quickly and is pretty for children's clothes, finish for cuffs and collars of cotton dresses or under clothes.

Linen Dress with Crocheted Yoke

This little dress has a ring yoke the pattern of which is shown in detail in No. 1 which illustrates a 4 ring band suitable for insertion.

By adding scallops, as shown in No. 2, an edging can also be made.

Directions for Edging

Ch 13, join 10 sts in a ring, 10 s c in ring, ch 3, 1 s c, to form picot, ch 10, join in ring, 10 s c in ring, 1 p, repeat making 5 rings in all, in last ring make 20 s c, 1 p, 10 s c in next ring, 1 p, repeat until 5 rings are complete, 1 s c, 1 d c, 1 tr c in first 3 sts of ch.

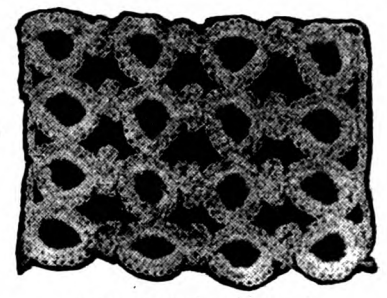
4th row.—Five rings as in 1st row.



5th row.—Same as 2nd row.

6th row.—Same as 3rd row.

Crocheted Yoke

Before attempting to fashion a yoke it would be well to practice working on an insertion or edging until one thoroughly understands the method of working, then it will be a simple matter to make a yoke.

To copy the one illustrated the work is begun at the lower edge of a sleeve. Begin with ch 10, join in ring and work as directed for edging until one has 19 rings. Complete by working back to starting point, ch 15, join in 10th st for ring, work as in 1st row and join to 1st row of rings as directed in edging. Make 20 rows of rings this width. Next 7 rows 6 rings wide only. This forms front of yoke. Then 20 rows 19 rings wide, break thread, join it between 6th and 7th rings from bottom of the back of the yoke, ch 15, join last 10 in ring, make a row 6 rings deep joining to rings as made. Make 3 more rows, ch 8, 1 s c in center of last ring, ch 5, 1 s c in p between rings, ch 5, 1 s c in 2nd ring, repeat, at the corner ch 8, 1 s c in top of ring, ch 2, 1 s c top same ring, ch 5, 1 s c in next ring, ch 2, 1 s c in same ring. Repeat, making a ch in this way along the edge of 16 rings. Fold balance of work together to form

Repeat, working back and forth to edge of the sleeve.

Make 4 rows of 6 rings each to form the other side of the center back and join to yoke, fold and join sleeve as directed.

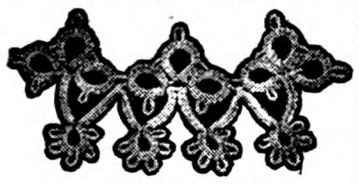
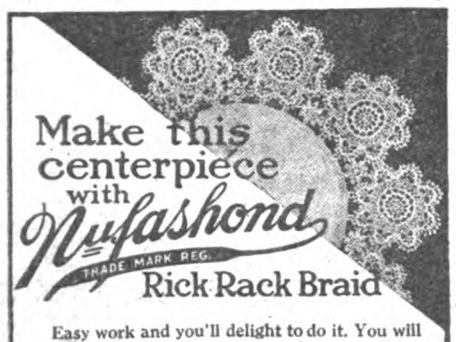
Finishing the sleeves by working 2 tr c in top of first ring, ch 5 or 6, 2 tr c in picot between rings, ch 2 tr c in p between next 2 rings, repeat, join with ch to first treble.



Add shells of 6 d c over each two trebles and finish with picot shells.

The neck has first a row of chains fastened to each ring and then the same finish as is on sleeves.

This little yoke, which is very effective if well-made, will outlast a couple of dresses.



Tatted Edging

Antidotes for Poisons

Prompt Action May Save Life if You Know What to Do While You Wait for the Doctor

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

IF anyone has taken poison don't wait for the doctor to come, but do something at once for a delay of even a few minutes may cause loss of life. Give the sufferer an emetic immediately and get the doctor as soon as possible, telephone him if you can. The simplest emetic is prepared by mixing a tablespoonful of salt or a tablespoonful of mustard in a glass of warm water and drinking it quickly. Force vomiting by sticking the finger down the throat.

In the following list will be found special antidotes for the commonest household poisons. The proper antidote is to be given at once, but don't fail to get the doctor also as soon as you can.

IODINE.—The commonest preparation is the tincture or "iodine paint," and is a violent poison if taken internally. Prepare boiled starch and let the patient drink it, or drink thick cornstarch or eat a quantity of boiled or baked potatoes.

FACE LOTIONS OR HAIR DYES.—Children sometimes get hold of these things and drink them, and as they sometimes contain white lead or sugar of lead they are dangerous internally. The best antidote is from half to a tablespoonful of Epsom salts in a tumbler of water according to the age of the child.

ARSENIC IN PARIS GREEN.—Fly and rat poisons, green dyes, Fowler's Solution, etc. Give an emetic and send for the doctor at once.

PLANT POISONS.—Wild parsley, bitter sweet, mountain ash berries, toadstools, poke berries. The symptoms are a weakened pulse and respiration, nausea and sometimes unconsciousness. The antidote is to produce vomiting and then give stimulants—whiskey, black coffee, or aromatic spirits of ammonia, a teaspoonful in a third of a glass of water—half the dose for young children.

CARBOLIC ACID POISONING.—This is shown by white scars on the lips and tongue and burning pain in the throat and stomach. Give whites of eggs, make the sufferer drink milk or if you cannot get any at once give flour and water or salad oil.

BICHLORIDE OF MERCURY; CORROSIVE SUBLIMATE; BLUE OINTMENT.—This kind of poisoning is shown by a severe pain and spasm in the throat and a metallic taste in the mouth. Give an emetic at once and then raw eggs and milk and keep the body warm with hot water bags. Mercury poisoning can occur from external application as well as by the mouth. Salves or antiseptic solutions on an open wound sometimes cause it.

OPIUM POISONING.—This is caused by morphine, an overdose of paregoric or soothing syrup, etc. The symptoms are intense sleepiness which is sometimes a stupor, pupils of the eyes contracted as small as the head of a pin and slow pulse and breathing. Give emetic, which may be repeated two or three times, and then large quantities of very strong black coffee. Keep the patient awake by forced walking and dash cold water on the face and chest at intervals.

AN OVERDOSE OF SULPHONAL, VERONAL, TRIONAL OR AMMONAL or any of the coal tar products. This drug produces great depression and stupor if too much is taken and even paralysis in extreme cases. The antidote is to stimulate the heart's action by giving strong black coffee or from half to a teaspoonful of aromatic spirits of ammonia in one third of a glass of water.

PTOMANE POISONING.—This is caused by eating decayed meat or fish or canned goods that have been kept too long, etc. The symptoms are nausea, severe prostration, severe pain and often diarrhea. Try to remove the cause of the trouble by producing vomiting and then give a tablespoonful of castor oil. Apply a hot water bag and if not at once relieved send for the doctor.

you never have. It is true that everyone has joys if they but look for them. I like this little verse:

"Not more of light, I ask, O God,
But eyes to see what is;
Not sweeter songs, but power to hear
The present melodies."—Ed.

TENNESSEE.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Here comes another old maid. Aren't they getting numerous? I am just ten years younger than "Contrary Mary." How old was she? If you please, I would like a seat over here by her while I stay for I am all the women folks in our family.

A word to the girls that have to stop school at an early age. I had to but I didn't give up. I studied at home and read everything worth while that I could get.

Sunshine, I agree with you about books. I just "love" them and have a stack of books and magazines, and a wood fire too. I have read all the books and they are waiting for someone else. Who wants them?

What has become of Bachelor Bill? Did the compliments(?) he got scare him? We wish he would come again, don't we, sisters?

How many of the sisters make chums of little brother? I do and find it rather jolly. "How do you?" I hear someone say. Well, I will tell you what we did this afternoon. We tramped all over fields and bluffs, setting traps. Did I want to go? No, not exactly but when he said, "Guess you'll want me to bring some more books from town next time," what was I to do? And that was not all. When that was done there was the new tractor that I had not seen and no one but Bud could show me how to run it. Then it was time for him to go to the train for Dad and I must help him get the flivver out. That is an example. Am I tired? Yes, but it did little brother lots of good if the loving smile he gave me is any sign.

With love to the sisters, MOLLY-JOE.

Molly-Joe.—That's a jolly, friendly sort of name and sounds as though you might be a good chum for small brother. Older sisters can exert a powerful influence for good over their brothers and you'll never regret the hours you have given to little Bud.—Ed.

MAIDEN ROCK, WIS.

DEAR EVERYBODY:

Since that day when I first took notice of the Sisters' Corner I have been an interested reader. It happened this way: I had the "indigoes" and in that mood I picked up the October, 1919, number of COMFORT and saw therein a letter from Criss. I read it and was surprised because it was interesting so I opened my eyes and came out of the dumps, found a stack of COMFORTS and settled down for a pleasant evening. How I enjoyed those letters! There was Nelle Fischer's, B's of Goshen, Bachelor Bill's, Lula's, George Garrison's, and Pearl Vesey's. Had about decided to pay you a visit when I found your letter written on the Western trail. Good luck to you. Please let us hear from you soon.

George Garrison, who is it that is so very particular? Is it you or the "fair sex"? If such a man as I believe you are, came into my sight I'd be there on the spot with some of the encouragement you mentioned. My ideas of a Christian are the same as yours. Let us pray—not say prayers.

Nelle Fischer, I have a bone to pick with you. My eyes used to be a dark blue until I read your account of a day spent with Mrs. Wilkinson and lo and behold! they turned green—real "catty" green. So don't come near me if you value your future, but write as usual.

Dear mothers, haven't you in your family a proverbial "black sheep"? Every family has, I believe. Is he, or she, high strung, restless and seemingly ungracious? Do you doubt that beneath the unruly exterior there is a heart? Perhaps it seems as if kindness leaves no impression, no rebuke kindly spoken calms the spirit. Try with all patience to meet rebellion with quiet helpfulness, not angrily, as one only loses ground when in the throes of its power. Let there be a happy medium,—do not let the child rule and do not let your heart harden. Sometime, perhaps not far distant, that child will see and understand and what a blessing if such a backward look is a stepping stone to a better life.

I am not married and am not even an old maid, being twenty-two.

"This I learned from a shadow tree
That to and fro did sway on the wall,
That our shadowed selves, our influence, may fall
Where we ourselves may never be."

Would like to hear from readers.

LILLIAN SJOSTROM.

MURRAY, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you please admit a little lady from the state of old Kentucky into your happy circle? I'm only a new subscriber but I've long been an interested reader and lover of COMFORT for my mother was a subscriber for a goodly number of years. I find the sisters' letters are very beneficial and I appreciate the help I get from them for surely no one lives to himself, and no one dies to himself; for every one of our lives, no matter how insignificant, have a great influence upon the life of someone else, either for good or bad. This sometimes we are not aware of. Nevertheless it is true; therefore it behooves every one of us to watch our actions, work and our very thoughts, and see, so far as it is consistent, that there is not anything in our lives that would cause a weaker brother or sister to err.

If the editor lady doesn't donate this to the waste-basket I'll call again and tell you of my four babies.

With best wishes to dear old COMFORT and its many readers, MRS. C. L. CHRISTENBERG.

Mrs. Christenberg.—The little verse in the letter written by Lillian Sjostrom, illustrates beautifully all that you say regarding our influence on those around us.

THERMOPOLIS, WYO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I don't know of any other way to acknowledge all the lovely letters I received in answer to my request in August COMFORT for a teacher for my boy. I have answered all that sent stamps and many that didn't, but there are so many that I couldn't, I was too busy. I have some delightful pen friends from among the writers of the letters. I received from five to thirteen a day for six weeks so maybe you think it wasn't a task to choose. But I am certainly pleased in my choice. Our teacher came from the sunny South, Navasota, Texas, and is all we could wish for. My boy is doing fine and we all love her. Many thanks to COMFORT and to you, Mrs. Wilkinson. I wish to thank all who answered my letter and I wish I could have secured positions for them. I have given some addresses to our county Supt. of Hot Springs Co., Wyo. and sent a number to a lady over the mountain who wanted a teacher. My COMFORT letter also found some of my husband's relatives in Forest, Miss., whom he had not heard from since his mother's death, years ago.

I would like to tell you of our part of Wyoming. It is a wonderful place. I love the free open country, the mountains, beautiful summer twilights and many other things.

One of the many lovers of COMFORT.

MRS. JOE KITCHINGS.

Add hot water to apples when baking and they will be juicy.

Set custards in pan of cold water before placing in oven to bake.

A teaspoon of burnt sugar will give an amber color to soup made from white meats.

A spoonful of sugar added to water when boiling turnips will prevent their tasting bitter.

Sprinkle dampened salt over wood floor before sweeping and there will be no dust.—MARYANN, Missouri.

A clean brick, heated, makes an excellent flatiron stand as it retains the heat much longer than the ordinary metal stand.

If too much salt has been added to soup, put in a few slices of raw potato and boil five minutes. The potato absorbs much of the salt.

Machine oil may be removed from white goods by rubbing the spot with chalk and letting it remain a few minutes before rubbing off.

Before putting potatoes in oven to bake, try greasing them well with lard. The skins will remain soft. —CONTENTED WIFE, Minnesota.

When sewing, place a shoe box near you in which to drop all ends of threads and scraps of cloth. This saves sweeping and avoids a clutter.—MEDDLESOME MATLIDA, Tenn.

When washing linen embroidered with white silk, use cold water. Keep hot water away from white silk and it will retain its whiteness.—NORA AND ETHA SHAFER, Hillsboro, Ohio.

When the cane seats in chairs begin to sag, scrub them well with boiling hot suds and set them in the sun to dry. This tightens the cane which may then be varnished or waxed.

Remedies

NAIL WOUND.—Put two or three handfuls of wood ashes in pan and add a quart of hot water. Soak the wound in this, keeping it as hot as it can be borne.

SORE EYES.—An old and popular remedy for ordinary inflammation of the eyes is to bind on them at night a poultice of tea leaves.—MRS. A. CROWLEY, Freshwater, Calif.

if you will pardon my boldness, to—to," he stammered desperately; Kitty felt quite sorry for him.

"Why, certainly—to see me," she smiled, gaily. "All right, we'll let Clint plow on. Adam—our mule, is old and slow, so that Clint needs plenty of time. We are going to town if something doesn't turn up, pretty soon, for our land is worn out, and our house just a shell—though the rose-garden is the loveliest in the county, I think. Still, you know, one can't eat roses—and we do have such awful appetites!"

She looked at the bread, now made into neat loaves, filling two pans. "Now see that bread?" "It's beautiful, wonderful!" admired the viscount, ardently.

"Isn't it? But bless you, it won't last Clint—and me, and Mattietta there, any time at all! You see we've got to move to town—unless something turns up mighty quick!"

"That reminds me," stammered Lord Leslie, "er—that—er—necklace you wore yesterday—might—er—might I ask you as a very great favor indeed, to let me take a look at it?"

Maybe the man wanted to buy it! Kitty's heart gave an ecstatic little leap, and then sank heavily—she couldn't sell Miss Molly's last gift—not for any money.

"Oh, yes—my jade necklace Miss Molly sent me. Do—do you want to see it with a view to—to buying it?" asked Kitty, hesitatingly. "I'd love to sell it to you, if I had bought it. But a gift—and poor Miss Molly died right after she sent it to me from San Francisco, where she bought it in a Chinese curio store, she said. But I'll show it to you, gladly."

She put the bread to rise in a warm place, and taking her visitor out on the front gallery, whose pillars were twined with roses of all colors like a beautiful mosaic, she—not listening to his incoherent explanations, ran upstairs, fished the necklace out of a drawer and bore it to him, hanging gracefully from one finger.

"Ugly thing—though it may be valuable, Miss Molly said, being real jade—whatever that is. And that pendant, now—I call that clumsy, no matter if it is artistic. And it's heavy, too—I'm going to take it off, when I can get hold of Clint long enough—it's fastened on very securely."

"I see," muttered the visitor, abstractedly. He peered curiously at the clasp of the necklace and looked up solemnly. "Miss Plair, this is our family crest—and this necklace was stolen from my mother's safe in our castle in Yorkshire with all her other jewels. There were none, however, as valuable as this—though the thieves never found it out!"

"For mercy's sake!" gasped Kitty, wide-eyed, "then if it was stolen, why it's yours—your mother's—and I'll be glad indeed to give it back to her."

"Let me explain: You see our family have a wonderful emerald—oh, I can't tell you how valuable it is. Mother had it brought down from London, where she kept it in a bank vault, for Gwen, my sister, to wear at her coming out ball. Somebody frightened her with tales of thieves, so she had a jeweler in whom she had confidence encase the emerald in silver and hang it on a jade necklace of small value as a pendant."

"O—o—oh!" breathed Kitty, eyes shining like stars. "Suppose it is in that ugly pendant!"

"Well, nobody knows, but the jeweler thought his assistant heard them talking about the emerald, and informed some friend in Yorkshire. At any rate, the safe was opened and every jewel in it stolen the very night before the ball.

"Scotland Yard was notified, detectives were sent down, servants examined—no use. My father offered a reward at last—and it still stands. Miss Plair, the Hanbury emerald—my father is the Earl of Hanbury—is, I think, in this pendant. The thieves thought it was not in the safe—they didn't know about its safeguard. We recovered some of the jewels—a string of pearls, another of opals; found them scattered about in Paris and London shops, but not the one jewel of worth. May I open this pendant?"

"Yes—oh, yes!" agreed Kitty, eagerly, "just cut into it with your penknife—I don't mind a bit."

So he cut into the soft silver, peeling it off like the skin of a fruit, and revealing a wonderful oblong stone—a pendant itself, though unset in a frame—such a rare, intense light glowing in its limpid green depths that a novice could not help knowing it was a gem of value—a monstrous emerald!

"It is my mother's emerald, Miss Plair," said the major, very softly, "and—I must take it away from you! I am sorry indeed."

But Kitty protested that she was delighted to have him find it—it was so romantic! And Mattietta must call Clint; it was nearly noon anyway, and Adam was always tired before noon—he was getting old.

Clint came; saw the big emerald with awe-struck eyes, and promptly agreed with his sister that they were delighted to have the major find it at last. And he must stay to dinner—it wouldn't be much, but Kitty could fry some ham and eggs in a jiffy.

When Kitty seconded the invitation the Englishman accepted with evident pleasure. Kitty, solicitous about her bread, flew into the kitchen where she tossed up some sour-cream biscuit, broiled some old Virginia ham, cured by the Smithfield recipe, made an omelet and coffee and before one might say Jack Robinson had dinner served, with snowy cloth, sparkling cut-glass, shining old silver, the Tryon china and the best lace centerpiece with a blue bowl full of Duchesse roses in the middle of it.

"You are going right straight back home and take the emerald to your mother, aren't you?" queried Kitty, while they were at table.

"No; fact is, this climate agrees with me so well that I think I'll stay on a bit longer," declared the major, trying to look like an invalid, though he had just finished his second slice of Smithfield ham!

"Then," said Clint, cool as you please, "why not stay on with us? We sort of feel like old friends since we found your emerald for you right in our own house."

"Yes—do," seconded Kitty, mentally taking inventory of her smokehouse and pantry, and wondering whether he could eat egg-bread if the flour gave out.

After a little demur, he was persuaded to stay—and learned every single thing about the people who entertained him before he had been there two days. About Susie Cameron, and how she would wait for Clint, and how awfully Kitty hated to give up the old place and leave her roses, and go where maybe you never saw a flower, and work in an office, making pothooks and hangers that nobody could read. Kitty had her doubts about ever learning stenography, though old Judge Landon had promised her a job in his office, when she did.

He followed the two about, helping them with their chores in his awkward way, and making them laugh at him a dozen times a day; even Mattietta giggled to see him hoeing potatoes, and was overcome with merriment when he wiped dishes for her mistress while she, Mattietta, mopped up the kitchen floor.

And, every day and every hour he was growing more and more deeply in love with Kitty Plair.

She was making bread one day, being deeply immersed in dough and talking about roses—a lovely Lamarque was twined round the kitchen window—when all of a sudden she began to cry, thinking of the pain that would come to her when she gave them up.

A big tear hung pendant from each eyelid; she turned them upon Lord Leslie and sobbed: "Won't you p-p-lease wipe my eyes? My hankchief is in my ap'on pocket."

Kitty Plair and coquetry didn't know each other by sight; but the most finished coquette could not have brought a lover to a declaration of his love more subtly. In a minute Kitty was in his arms, dough and all; he was wiping her eyes with his own handkerchief, and whispering that he loved her more than all the wealth of the world, and asked nothing better than to be allowed to wipe away her tears for the rest of her life.

Kitty could do nothing—she was held so tightly that she couldn't turn her head—she simply had to "stay put". Having her at this disadvantage, he used it boldly, declaring her arguments to be futile—he wanted her to grow roses for him in his gardens in England. Clint might have Susie Cameron——

"But poor Clint has no money," protested Kitty, still at a disadvantage.

"Well—the reward for the emerald will be quite enough——"

But she interrupted him fiercely, "Don't dare mention reward to us!" she stormed, struggling impotently, "or—or—I'll never speak to you again!"

He earnestly vowed he wouldn't; but he'd be mighty glad to invest a little money in the plantation, helping his brother-in-law buy machinery, stock, and so on. And wouldn't Kitty look up and say yes?

After a brief silence Kitty looked up; her lips, rosier than her rosiest Duchesse, may have whispered that monosyllable, but nobody heard it, for they were very promptly and firmly sealed in a way that seemed very satisfactory to both parties concerned.

Mattietta coming from the woodpile with an apronful of chips saw the tableau in the kitchen. She dropped her chips and fled precipitately to the ten-acre field. "Mr. Clint—Mr. Clint—run quick! Dat man in de house is a-holdin' Miss Kitty and a-kissin' her—she can't git a-loose!"

Clint whistled softly at this astonishing intelligence, stopping Adam in his tracks. "I thought as much," he mused. "Kitty didn't see it coming, but a fellow with a sweetheart knows the signs." To Mattietta he said: "Run along back, Mattietta—it's all right. Don't go to the kitchen," he added, hastily, "not for—some time."

"I bet dey's courtin'," mused Mattietta, who was twelve, and had as yet no opinion of sweethearts and love-making, and-but small knowledge. "I reckon I better go back an' pick up some mo' chips."

In the kitchen the two, now happily certain they were designed for each other from the beginning of time, sat holding hands boldly. "We'll call the emerald the gem of destiny," declared the major, because it brought us together."

"But where'll you hide it so it'll be safe?" worried Kitty. Bob—imagine a live lord named Bob!—laughed happily. "I don't care where the matre hides it in future; but I do know where I'll hide my own jewel of the world—deep in my heart, where no thief can ever, ever find her!"

Mattietta, poking her head in the door, muttered disgustedly: "My Lawd—dey ain't th'oo courtin' yit!" and fled again to the woodpile.

Was A. J. Guilty?

When Andrew Jackson was the Democratic candidate in the presidential campaign of 1828, his opponent attempted to capitalize "Old Hickory's" alleged illiteracy. Andrew's education, limited to "readin', 'ritin', an' 'rithmetic," could not be considered extensive, and he was probably a poor speller.

In that memorable campaign, Seba Smith, a humorist who wrote under the name of Major Jack Downing, told a story that undoubtedly popularized an expression but failed to keep the hero of the Battle of New Orleans out of the White House. He asserted that Andrew Jackson, believing "Oll Korrect" was the right spelling for "All Correct," indorsed documents with the false initials, "O. K."

This authorship of the symbol conflicts with another story of its birth, which attributes it to the days when finest wine and tobacco were imported from the Santo Domingo town of Aux Cayes, a French name of which the proper pronunciation is "O. K." As the port supplied quality products, the best of anything, so the story goes, became known by this term.

The origin of O. K. is shrouded in mystery. It may have sprung from the shippers and merchants, or it may have arisen from Andrew Jackson's misspelling of "All Correct."

Labor Savers Lead in Tennessee

Home labor savers have been made in large quantities by Tennessee women working under home demonstration agents during the past year. Time-saving and labor-saving equipment is doing much to help the farm woman meet her war problems. Agents in the state report the making under their supervision of the following: 263 fireless cookers, 92 iceless refrigerators, 1,558 fly-traps, 47 kitchen cabinets, 19 floor mops, 25 wheel trays, and 26 ironing boards. Water systems were put in 60 homes and shower baths in seven more. During a fly campaign, 1,333 houses were screened.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Valve Grinding

ONE of the first jobs of repairing undertaken by the average owner is the grinding of the valves. He reads instructions relative to this operation, and, because the valves play an important part in the performance of the motor, believes that a test of his skill as a repairman rests in the proper seating of the valves. If conditions were ideal, it would be a simple matter to seat a valve. However, there are certain conditions which are prevalent on present-day cars, and the purpose of this article is to set forth some of the conditions for which the workman should search.

If the car was purchased new last season and the valves have not been ground since the job left the factory, the chances are that the seats, especially the exhaust valve seats, will require recutting.

Great demands have been placed on the factories for cars. The public has demanded them and the factories have done their best in an endeavor to satisfy the demand. The result is that in most cases the cylinder castings have not become properly seasoned before machining. In most cases, the hot gases inside the cylinders will distort the valve seats, a condition which no amount of valve grinding will correct.

Usually the dealer from whom you purchased the car has a set of reseating tools which you can borrow, or, if he will not loan them, it will be advisable to have him recut the seats for you.

Next, the position of the valve head to its stem should be determined. If the head is warped it can sometimes be straightened by an expert workman, but in most cases it will be well to buy a new valve. Mechanics test the trueness of a valve by catching the stem in a lathe chuck. However, the average motorist does not have a lathe and in this case he may use a bit brace. The valve stem is caught in the chuck while the other end can be placed on point such as a center punch held between the jaws of a vise. In the majority of cases it will be found that the valve has been recessed in the head to rest on the lathe center in the original machining.

After ascertaining that the valve heads are true with their stems, carefully inspect the valve face. The face of an exhaust valve may show deep pit marks where it has come in contact with the hot exhaust gases. It would require a whole day's grinding to remove these pit marks and it is far better to remove them with a fine file. There are cutters on the market for refacing of valves. The use of a special tool for this work is advisable for the reason that the angle is insured while with a file there is a chance that the angle will change because of the way the file is held. If it is decided upon to purchase a special tool, be certain that you get one of the same angle as the valve. Some valves are 30 degrees, 40 degrees, 45 degrees, etc.

Let us now assume that everything checks up the way it should and we are ready to commence the grinding. In the head of the valve will be found a slot or two small holes. If a slot is there, it will be possible to use a screwdriver blade for the grinding operation or, if the holes appear in the head, look in the tool kit of the car for a wrench having two prongs to engage these holes. If a special wrench is not found, it is a simple matter to make one by heating a flat piece of steel and roughly forging it. By careful use of the file it will be an easy matter to make the wrench fit the valve.

There are several satisfactory valve-grinding compounds on the market, but a good combination is obtained by mixing fine emery dust or ground glass and cylinder oil to paste-like consistency. Smear the face of the valve and its seat with the mixture and rotate the valve back and forth a quarter turn under little pressure until a light silvery line is visible for the entire circumference of the valve face. Among the common mistakes is the attempt to force a valve to seat which is pitted or grooved by exerting pressure. This practice is dangerous, as the valve seat is liable to be cut. It should be borne in mind that the seat and valve should first be cleaned up with special tools if they are pitted or grooved, after which they can be ground in to a perfect register. Some manufacturers of low-priced cars do not grind valves but cut the seat and valve face to a certain angle, place the valve in its seat and then strike the head of valve a blow with a wood mallet.

Useful Pointers

Speed Maniacs

Some folks seemed to have gained the impression that in order to have others think of him as a good driver he must frequently show flashes of speed and quick stopping. The schoolboy may look upon this type of driver as somewhat of a hero, but to the seasoned motorist he is branded as a "speed maniac." First, it must be distinctly understood that speed does not denote a good driver. No one can get more speed out of a car than is really in it, and by advancing the spark and throttle levers to the limit you obtain speed. It is no art to obtain speed and anyone who cares to advance the levers can get it. The car invariably receives severe pounding and strains during the demonstration of speed and unless you have a deep pocketbook from which to pay the repair bills do not copy after the speed demon.

Running Car Without Storage Battery

Let us assume that for some reason or other the storage battery has been rendered absolutely useless. By this we mean that it will not furnish sufficient current for ignition purposes. Unless another storage battery can be obtained, there is but one alternative and that is to install a set of dry cells. Remove the storage battery and connect the dry cells in series to the cables which were formerly connected to the storage battery. If possible, it is essential that the generator be rendered inoperative. Many generators have a fuse which can be removed while others have a short-circuiting clip. If, however, it is impossible for the operator to render the generator inoperative, the car should not be driven at a speed greater than seven or eight miles per hour in direct drive. If the distance to be covered is not too great and the motor speed is held as above suggested, the chances are that the generator will not produce sufficient current to injure the windings. Running with the generator unprotected is never recommended except in an emergency. It will be impossible to use the electric starter or burn the lights until the storage battery is replaced.

Starting on a Hill

Quite frequently a driver will experience considerable difficulty in starting a car which has been stopped on a hill. This is due to the fact that the instant the brakes are released the car commences to roll down hill and the engaging of the clutch causing the motor to stall. Until a driver has made one or two attempts at starting a car which has stopped on a hill, he is apt to underestimate the factors to be taken into consideration. The proper method of starting under such conditions is to place the engine in operation and then throw out the brake and clutch pedals. The foot brake should be sufficient to hold the car and so the emergency brake should be released. Advance the spark and open the throttle about one third or enough so that the engine just commences to race without the load. Allow the clutch pedal to come back in until you feel a slight drag which would indicate that engagement is very near. Very gradually release the pressure from the foot-brake pedal and at the same time gradually allow the clutch to engage. The point to be remembered is that the clutch engagement must be gradual inasmuch as the engine will be called upon to carry a large load, and sudden engagement would only cause the motor to stall.

Automobile Locks

It is a common occurrence to pick up a newspaper or automobile magazine and read about some new lock for automobiles which has just been placed on the market. The majority of these locks will prevent theft of the car but some of them have their bad features due to the principle of application. Some of the locks cause the gasolene to be turned off, some prevent the steering gear from being turned, others lock the wheels, ignition, etc. One popular car has an arrangement which locks the transmission, starting motor and floor board in one operation. In the writer's opinion, the locks which prevent the starting of the motor and yet do not prevent the pushing of the car, are very efficient. In case of fire, the car may be saved, providing it can be pushed out of the way. There are several arguments for and against the different kinds of locks. In defence of the lock which prevents the turning of the wheels, it is stated that the arrangement renders the car absolutely thief-proof inasmuch as it cannot be towed away.

Clear Vision

A preparation consisting of equal parts glycerine and alcohol rubbed on the windshield glass is said to insure a clear vision during a rainstorm. It is claimed that the water will run away the instant it strikes the glass and will not collect in beads as is the case on a windshield which has not been treated.

Questions Answered

My Ford cylinder head has a crack caused by freezing. Can you tell me of any kind of cement that would stop the leak, or could you recommend some home mixture for this purpose? E. S., Cairo, Okla.

A.—The most satisfactory method of repairing the cracked cylinder head is to have it welded by the oxy-acetylene method. If the job is handled by an expert workman the repair should make the head as good as new. The writer has viewed several jobs which were mended by circulating a preparation in the cooling systems and for several reasons he advises strongly against this method. There are a few cements on the market which harden when exposed to air and which are said to satisfactorily mend cracks. However, due to the expansion and contraction of the metal at the different temperatures, the duration of such a repair is unknown and to feel content to know that the job is done right, you should have the crack welded.

My 1916 model Ford has just lost power because of cylinders or piston rings or both being worn. The cylinders are not scored. I had new rings put in last spring, but not oversize. Can I put in oversize rings without reboring the cylinders? Or would it be better to put in oversize pistons? With oversize pistons would I need oversize rings? (2) What is the reason that a spotlight will burn out when the headlights will not? H. F., Grant, Mich.

A.—It is impossible to state whether oversize pistons and rings would prove beneficial. If the cylinder bores have worn oval shape, reboring will prove the only satisfactory remedy. Would suggest that you have the cylinders inspected by an expert workman in your vicinity, and by careful use of calbers he should be able to determine whether the cylinders have worn oval shape and require reboring. The writer would assume that the head and spot lights obtain their current directly from the Ford magneto. If such is the case, the chances are that you are experiencing spotlight trouble due to the fluctuation in the current voltage at different car speeds. There are choke coils which can be purchased at accessory houses which will prevent the voltage rising to an abnormal value. If you will install one of these coils and use a bulb of the correct voltage, I believe your spotlight trouble will be at an end.

Poor Compression.—Ford, car, 1919 model cylinder No. 4 (rear) develops no power, and No. 3 misses sometimes, though spark is strong. Compression is weaker than in other cylinders. Spitting noticeable when warmed up. Intake valve may be partly clogged or fail to close tight. E. P. G., Windy, W. Va.

A—You state that cylinder No. 4 develops no power while No. 3 misses some of the time. Would certainly suggest removing the cylinder head and an inspection of the valves. Carefully grind the valves in these cylinders and after replacing the head test the compression. If the compression is still low for these two cylinders you had better remove the pistons and examine the piston rings. Replace them with new ones if necessary to obtain good compression. If you have good compression in these cylinders and the plugs deliver a hot spark there should be plenty of "life" produced by these two balky members, providing the carburetor is adjusted properly.

Stunting Spring Pigs

POSSIBLE profits are being lost or going to waste on thousands of farms at the present time where spring pigs are being fed the "food of maintenance" instead of a generous ration calculated to grow the youngsters quickly into lusty, fat, round hogs for the November or Christmas market. This may be better understood when it is stated that at fall sales of pure-bred hogs it is not unusual to see spring-born pigs weighing 300 pounds or more. On many, many farms, on the contrary, we see pigs in autumn weighing 75 to 100 pounds, and the wormy ones and runts may be not more than 50 pounds.

Getting Better Growth

First and foremost, one should not expect thrifty pigs from a semi-starved sow that has come through the winter in a stable, without much if any exercise and on a ration of manure pickings, straw, cornstalks, some house slop and little if any grain. Pigs to do well must have right parentage, by which we mean that they should be from graded dams and by a pure-bred sire of a breed suited for pork production, such as are the Poland Chinas, Berkshires and Durocs or Jersey Reds, some of the white breeds and the belted Hampshire. If bacon is the specialty, Tamworths and some of the white breeds are specially suitable for that. No matter what breed is chosen, pure blood, at least on the sire's side, will give the pigs a far better start toward early maturity and big weights that can be had by the use of a scrub, grade or razor-back sire.

Feeding the Selected Hogs

Let every farmer get it out of his head that any young animal can successfully be raised without milk. First there is the milk of the dam and a good yield of that should be insured by generous feeding during pregnancy. That feeding should include clover or alfalfa hay, tankage, dry from a self-feeder to balance any corn that is fed, and some milk or skimmilk in addition to ground grain, bran and oilmeal. We do not mean that the sow is to be fed on such feed; but that she is to be kept healthy, thrifty and with enough and to spare for her own use, that of her unborn pigs and to insure milk for their reception. The pigs then should have a succession of green crops to graze with their dam from early spring to autumn, and here slop and self-feeder nutrients should be allowed so that the pigs will gain weight every day. The experiment station of each state will be glad to furnish our readers with special bulletins telling how to feed hogs in each state, according to the climate and the sorts of green crops and other feeds most available there, so that none need lack special scientific advice on such subjects.

Summer Feeding

The cheapest growths are made on green crops, with other feeds "on the side." Science has shown that milk is absolutely necessary, not from the dam alone, but after weaning to get the best development, and that the grain or seed of any plant is not sufficient for complete nutrition. The seed and leaves and stalks must be fed. For the reason we advocate allowing clover and alfalfa hay when green crop is not available, to round out and balance the ration of milk and meals, with tankage extra. Corn is balanced by tankage. Wheat middlings also is splendid feed from a self-feeder in combination with the others, and such feeding, with skimmilk, whey or buttermilk, twice daily as a drink, will put the hogs onto the market early and weighing heavily.

Hogs also must be kept free from worms. It is worms and a combination of dry, dirty yard, old wallows and bare-bitten old, hog-contaminated pasture, lacking shade and drinking water, that stunts pigs, and such pigs are bred, fed, kept and marketed at a loss. The other sort make "all kinds of money" for their intelligent producer.

Mutton Lambs for Market

Time was when mutton was not appreciated by the average householder of America; but a great demand and appreciative market has of recent years arisen, especially for choice, well-fed lamb of a mutton breed of sheep. The unpopularity of mutton years ago was attributable largely to the fact that sheep were kept primarily as brush and weed eradicators or scavengers, were of the oily Merino type and not fed off fast to produce meat of fine flavor. Another reason was that sheep often were not slaughtered properly, so that the animal heat was not quickly eliminated, and the meat of such sheep had an unpleasant "sheepy" flavor. Since mutton breeds were introduced, better methods of feeding practiced and sheep kept for the production of hothouse lamb and fat lamb for the June or July market, when green peas are available as a side dish, there is no more attractive or palatable meat. Most people are conceding the fact and paying high prices for lamb of such fine quality.

The Lambs to Raise

Dorset ewes crossed with a Southdown or Shropshire furnish a fine quality of lamb, or the crossing may be reversed, or any one of the three breeds mentioned may be used to produce suitable lambs. The hothouse lamb requires special, heated stables and is an expensive proposition, besides requiring special skill and experience on the part of the feeder, and a special market. The Dorset often is used for such production as it is prolific, breeds early and may even have two crops of lambs a year. The lambs for this special trade are dropped in winter and fed off to arrive in market before grass-fed lambs are ready, and, being comparatively scarce, bring fancy prices for hotel and club table use.

Unifofmity Important

It is highly important that lambs should go to market in the most attractive condition. That never is the case if the breeding stock is mixed. The breeding should be uniform to start with and then the lambs should be selected, lot after lot, as they mature, and so that they will look alike and in the same condition on reaching the market. To have lambs attractive so that they will quickly find an appreciative buyer and price, they should be castrated and docked when two or three weeks old. No undocked lamb should be included in a bunch of market lambs. All "rag tags" and "tatterdemalions" should be excluded. Early docking makes a neat, plump rump and leg of mutton, or gives the hind parts such an appearance. Long tails make all lambs look untidy and at once suggest western or ranch origin where special feeding may not have been given. Pea-fed lambs of the far west are an exception, as feeders there are making a specialty of the business and have built up a fine reputation for the uniformity and quality of their lambs. Early castration and docking also prevent setback in growth and thrift. Uncut lambs are "docked" as culls and newly altered big lambs are termed "stags" in some markets, and never bring a fancy price.

Fattening Lambs Fast

To get lambs quickly into condition for the market, one has to start with the sire and dam. Both must be in fine condition at mating time; then the ewe must be well exercised during pregnancy, so that she will not become sick when generously fed roots and silage, clover or alfalfa hay, crushed oats, wheat bran, shelled corn and a little flaxseed meal. The greatest possible care must be taken not to overfatten the ewes, but to keep them muscular and with relaxed bowels as lambing time comes on. So fed and managed, they will have strong lambs and plenty of milk for their reception, and if good feeding then is continued then on a succession of green crops, the lambs will speedily put on flesh and fat and be in fit condition for market and there obtain profitable prices when poorly nourished lambs are making slow progress and never become fit for the choice lamb trade.

Planning the Pasture

"Some one says, "That sounds silly, isn't the pasture already planned?" But it isn't the least bit silly when you stop and think. The pasture lot is already planned. It is there right on the farm, some wasteland unfit for the plow, perhaps, the same pasture that has been used for years. No change has been made in it. But the stock on the farm has increased and to all probability the "old pasture" has run out. It may not yield half as much feed as it did five or ten years ago, so that when summer and fly time comes there isn't half enough feed. The cattle grow thin and we blame the flies.

When Feed Gets Short

The time to plan for the "short feed" season is right now. Let's look over the old pasture and see if we will have to feed extra next summer. If we should, then what shall we feed?

Plymouth Rocks for Utility

FOR years every poultry expert has asserted that the American breeds, such as Plymouth Rocks, Rhode Island Reds and Wyandottes, could not compare with Leghorns and the other Mediterranean breeds as egg producers, yet last year Wyandottes won in the egg contests held at the the Connecticut Agricultural College, and the Maine State Agricultural Experiment Station has produced and now possesses a most wonderful Plymouth Rock hen which is the champion egg producer of the breed and bids fair to beat the world's record of any breed. She was a late chicken, not being hatched until May 12th, which was, of course, very late for a bird of the breed. She was not forced in any way, being just one of the flock which received the usual rations. But in November, when she was not quite six months old, she commenced to lay, and by the first of December she had laid eleven eggs, and before the end of the month had produced twenty more large, perfectly developed eggs. And she kept up this phenomenal performance right through the year, laying 298 eggs before the end of October. A wonderful performance for a hen of any breed, and certainly amazing for a Plymouth Rock, and it proves conclusively the value and results of intelligent breeding.

The Plymouth Rock, though not a prolific egg producer, is the favorite with the Maine farmer because of other good qualities which it has. Professor Woods, director of the Maine State Agricultural Experiment Station, has worked along the lines of selection in the breeding pens, with the special object of building up a strain of great egg-producing Plymouth Rocks, and has succeeded. The Maine State Experiment Station was the first of the state poultry plants to adopt the trap nest—I understand it was invented there—which makes it possible to know exactly how many eggs each individual hen lays, and keep an accurate record of her progeny and their productive powers, so that when it comes to making up breeding pens each spring they have been able to select hens that are not only good individual layers, and mate them to cockerels whose dams and granddams were also good layers, with the result that in each generation for the last few years there has been a marked improvement in the productiveness of pullets, the average having been worked up from 150 to 200 eggs per bird, until now comes the astonishing achievement of this Maine bred hen, known as Number 414 M, which laid 298 eggs in her pullet year, and now, in her second year, bids fair to outstrip her pullet performance, for she laid the last egg of her pullet year on October 29, commenced to moult early in November, devoted three months to the business of growing a new suit of clothes, and on January 30 started laying again with all her former record-breaking pace, laying twenty-three eggs in February, and averaging six a week ever since. All patriotic Americans should rejoice that the hen to achieve such prominence is a Plymouth Rock, for they were the first American creation in poultry to achieve any public recognition, and were the favorite general-purpose fowl until about twenty years ago, when White Wyandottes—and, later, Rhode Island Reds—were developed, and became so extremely popular that they threw the Plymouth Rocks very much in the shade. They might have died out entirely if it had not been for a few staunch friends like Director Charles D. Woods, who have worked persistently to develop their laying qualities, and have succeeded so well that now, at the Maine State Agricultural Station, there are dozens of sisters, half-sisters and cousins of Number 414 M with egg records which reach or overstep the coveted 200-egg mark which poultrymen have been striving for, and, of course, lots of cockerels which come of the same great strain.

Cockerel Number 160, to whom the great 298-egg hen is mated, is quite as wonderful in his own way as Number 414 M, for he developed very rapidly, and when only six months old weighed nine pounds, which is a pound more than the standard requires of a Plymouth Rock cockerel at nine months. He is a strong, handsome bird, alert and vigorous. His mother and grandmother and great grandmother were all birds with trap-nest records, which show that they laid 247, 196 and 191 eggs, respectively, in their pullet years. So, besides individual strength and health, he possesses most desirable qualities for really profitable birds so strongly established that he is sure to transmit them to his progeny.

And the time has come when a farmer's wife must realize that if she expects to get good prices for her eggs and chickens they must be cultivated and culled just as carefully as fruit or vegetables. You all know it is no use expecting fine apples from a half-wild scrub tree. If you are planting a young orchard or berry patch, you select the best varieties because you know they will produce the best fruit and ripen evenly. But, unfortunately, few general farmers or housewives think there is any advantage in keeping thoroughbred fowls, except for the showroom, and they go on year after year feeding quantities of grain to a lot of mongrels who don't half pay for it, when they could be reaping a splendid harvest if they would just realize a few facts which are becoming more evident every year to the people who are making poultry their entire business.

First, a scrub hen costs just as much to feed as a good one, and the best will only lay about seventy-five eggs a year, whereas the thoroughbred hen will lay from 150 to 200. Mixed eggs only bring the lowest market price, while the eggs from the thoroughbred will bring the highest during the winter, and in the spring will sell for at least two dollars a setting of fifteen eggs. And if your stock comes from ancestry which has taken many prizes at shows or in egg-laying contests, the price of the settings will rise up to five or ten dollars each.

No matter what variety of breed you have on hand at the present time, they must receive special care just now. Don't neglect the youngsters when they leave the brooder or hen. When they are eight weeks old, they should be separated from their mothers, and the families divided; the young pullets being relegated to colony coops in an orchard or partly shaded meadow, where they will have extensive free range; the cockerels being placed in the semi-confinement of yards, as their ultimate fate is the frying pan, which necessitates plump bodies, while free range would only develop frame and muscle.

Our colony houses are six feet long, three feet wide, thirty-six inches high in front, and twenty-four inches at the back. They are made of light scantling; the ends, back and roof being covered with roofing paper; and the front, to within eight inches of the ground, with unbleached muslin, which insures perfect ventilation and prevents rain beating in upon the birds when they are on the roosts, which are fixed a foot from the bottom and nine inches from the back of the coop. Two holes are made, nine inches apart, in the middle of each end of the coop, and a heavy rope knotted through them to form handles.

The coops having no flooring, and the whole construction being very light, they are easily moved to fresh ground every week, and so kept clean with little trouble; an important item when there is a large quantity being used. Having a large orchard, we placed the coops in rows thirty feet apart, as two sides of the orchard adjoin woodland, through which a never-failing stream runs, so the birds have a splendid range.

Twenty birds are placed in each coop. The first week a portable yard five feet long is placed in front of each coop so that the young chicks cannot wander off and get lost, as they surely would in strange quarters. During that time, a self-feeding hopper and a drinking fountain are placed inside the coop. When the yard is removed, the individual vessels are dispensed with, large drinking tubs and food hoppers being stationed midway between every four coops, to reduce time and labor in caring for the birds.

The large hoppers are nothing more than boxes, five feet long, two feet wide, and six inches deep, over which is placed an A-shaped cover, made of slats one inch apart, to prevent the birds getting into the box and scratching the grain onto the ground, where it will be wasted. For water, five-gallon kegs are used, with an automatic escape, which keeps a small pan continually full. Both feed and water are placed under a rough shelter to protect them from sun and rain. Using such large receptacles, it is only necessary to fill them every other day.

If you have no orchard, or other partly shaded place for coops, it will be necessary to erect some sort of shelters for the birds to rest under during the heat of the day. Any sort of material or shape will do, so long as protection from the sun is afforded. If free range is quite impossible (as it often is for suburban poultry-keepers), the birds must be given as large yards as possible, and supplied with lots of scratching material, over which small grain must be scattered two or three times a day. Fresh green bone will be better than the beef scraps. Vegetable food is imperative under such circumstances. Sow a large patch of Swiss chard; it is a true cut and come again crop. Oats and rape are also useful crops for poultry keepers who cannot give their birds free range during the summer.

BARRED ROCK COCK.

The cockerels which go into the market pen are fattened and sold as quickly as possible, except the few we keep for stock, and these are given larger yards and fed in the same manner as pullets on range.

For fattening birds, use ground corn and oats in equal parts, add half a pint of charcoal and moisten with skim milk. Give plenty of green food and sharp grit. Feed little and often. All expedition must be used in the matter of marketing, for every day's delay after they reach the required weight is a dead loss.

Cockerels and old hens should not be allowed with growing pullets. When cockerels are allowed to run with pullets, they will never mature to full size. Too often we see cockerels and pullets allowed free range on the farm, and allowed to mix together. Good stock cannot be grown in this manner, and the future egg yields of the flock will not be as great as they would be if more care were given to the growing stock.

Cockerels intended for breeders should be given every advantage that will tend to perfect and give full development, and I prefer, when possible, to give them free range, isolated from hens and pullets. Next to free range, comes large yards, with well-littered, roomy coops or roosts out-of-doors. Good cockerels as I ever raised lived all summer in a yard without a coop. Poles were set up in the shade of a large apple tree, and on these the cockerels roosted. In the event of a storm they sought the protection of the tree. They were a hardy, close-feathered bunch, and stood the rigors of a severe winter in an open house with the utmost comfort. At best they should have only a roof to protect them from rain.

A. O.—You don't say what you feed, so it is difficult to tell what has caused the trouble, which appears to be liver complaint. If you have been feeding much corn, reduce the quantity. Give them mash in the morning, made of two parts finely-chopped clover or alfalfa hay which has been steamed several hours, or ground oats and wheat. Don't give them more than they will eat up clean in ten minutes. At night, scatter mixed grain, oats, Kafir corn and wheat in deep litter, so they will have to scratch for every kernel. Add one teaspoonful of sulphate of magnesia to every pint of drinking water, one day a week, until they have had three doses.

M. H.—There are so many good incubators on the market that it is quite impossible to single out the one that is best. Your best plan would be to find out what manufacturers have agents in your vicinity, so that you can look at the machines and select the one which appeals to you most. To make a fireless brooder, the first requisite is a box or an empty butter or lard tub. If a box is used it should be two feet square and seven inches deep, with a lid at least five inches deep. Or if you can get two strong boxes the same size, which are six or seven inches deep, take off the lids, and use one of the bottoms for a lid. Put two hinges on the back, and a hook and eye at the front. Cut a hole three inches square in the center of the front, for the chicks to run in and out of. At both ends of the lid or top box make half-inch holes three inches apart and an inch from the top. This completes the outside of the brooder. Put cleats in each corner of the top and bottom boxes, two inches from the top. Then make a frame to fit inside the box and rest on the cleats; cover it with burlap, and then cut a long strip of felt, flannel or old blanket, or any soft woolen material. It does not matter much what it is so long as it is long and woolly. It should be about four inches wide. Make cuts one inch apart the entire length, leaving about half an inch as a heading. Then stitch the fringed material to the burlap, commencing in the center of the frame, and going round and round; the rows to be about an inch apart. At first, put the frame onto the cleats in the lower part of the brooder, with the fringed material hanging down, to make a comfortable covering for the chicks. After the babies are about two weeks old, the frame must be put on to the cleats in the top part of the box, which will lift the ends of the material about three inches from the floor of the brooder. At first, when the screen is in the lower half of the brooder, fold a piece of cotton batting and fit carefully over it, filling in the entire space to the edge of the box. In the top half, put a layer of excelsior about an inch and a half deep, then fill in with cotton batting to the edge. The burlap on the frame being porous, and the cotton batting ditto, allows a perfect system of ventilation from the front opening to the holes in the top part of the brooder. Of course, when the frame is moved to the top part of the brooder, some of the cotton batting has to be removed but by that time the chicks have grown considerably, and furnish a great deal more animal heat than they did at first. After the babies are about four weeks old, it is well to take out the frame with the fringed woolen material attached, and use another frame covered with burlap, which is to keep the cotton batting in place. Before using the brooder, give it a coat of whitewash, and cover the floor with sweepings from the haymow, or finely cut hay, to make a warm carpet for the chicks to stand on. Of course, such brooders should be well housed in a light, dry place. A good coop can be made out of a piano or large dry goods box. A piano box can usually be got for about two dollars from any store that sells pianos, and will, with the addition of a couple of small windows and paint or roofing paper, make it waterproof. It makes a good house in which to keep two or three such brooders. In front of each brooder there should be a wire enclosure, so that the chicks can run out and play without the flocks getting mixed up. After they are two weeks old, it is well to make small outdoor runs, but never let them out in damp or windy weather.

L. N.—The birds have inflammation of the mucous membrane around the eye, which sometimes follows cold, but is just as frequently the result of some irritating substance, such as wood ashes or fresh lime. Should you have any more affected in the same way, confine them in a shaded coop, as the light hurts their eyes. Put fifteen drops of tincture of euphrasia in a pint of water. Keep it before the birds all the time, removing any other drinking water. Cleanse the eye by bathing; one part of dioxogen to two of water, or any simple antiseptic lotion which you may have in the house. When bathing the eye, see that the nostrils are open and the mouth clean, after which anoint with the following ointment: Half a teaspoonful of boric acid, finely powdered; half a teaspoonful of subnitrate of bismuth, well mixed into a tablespoonful of vaseline.

C. J. S.—Wheezing, and such symptoms of cold, don't always mean roup. In an attack of roup, the eyes usually look watery, and the bird's body feels feverish to the touch. The mouth and nostrils show a deposit of mucous, and always there is the one unmistakable symptom belonging to true roup, which is the extremely disagreeable odor which can be noticed on the bird's breath. Open the beaks of the sick birds, and examine their mouths and throats for a slimy looking discharge or a cheesy yellowish deposit, and then for the unmistakable odor of the breath. If that is not present, you may be sure that you have only a common cold, or at worst, bronchitis, to fight. If, however, the symptoms are those of roup, you must at once remove the sick birds from the rest of the flock, and keep them in a strict quarantine, for roup is very contagious, and will quickly advance through the flock unless you take drastic means to check its advance. After removing the sick birds, clean the chicken-house, feed and water dishes, perches and nests, and use a strong disinfectant over all. Treat the sick birds as follows: Get ten cents' worth of permanganate of potassium from the drug store, dilute one teaspoonful of the flakes in a quart of water. For use, dilute a tablespoonful of the solution with two tablespoonfuls of water, then fill a small syringe and spray the birds' throats, nostrils and eyes three times a day. Following the syringe, use a wing feather. Strip it to within about an inch of the tip, then saturate it with the wash, and thoroughly swab out the bird's throat and mouth, which will answer almost as well as spraying. Put a teaspoonful of kerosene oil into every quart of drinking water for the general flock as a preventive. Don't slight the work, for now is the most important time of the year. Look over the poultry house and see if there is not some crack or knothole in the neighborhood of the perch which needs covering up. It is usually some such unsuspected draft which causes common cold that is apt to develop into roup and become epidemic. Birds that show signs of cold, running eyes, cough or sneezing, should be at once confined to a quarantine coop. Place in a warm sheltered outhouse far from the usual poultry quarters, and treat as follows: Fill a syringe with a solution of permanganate of potassium, or any good disinfectant, and thoroughly spray the bird's throat, mouth, nostrils and eyes. If you have no syringe, bathe with the mixture, then use the tip of a good stiff wing feather in the throat and nostrils.

S. E. C.—The male guinea's wattles and crest are a little larger than those of the hen. He also has a trick of stretching his neck and body upwards and running about as if he were on his tiptoes; stopping suddenly and looking all round, as if there was something he could fight. The cry is also different. The hen bird seems to say "Buckwheat," or "Go back," in a monotonous, mournful way.

H. S.—It is only a waste of time to incubate eggs from roupy stock—the chicks would not develop into profitable hens. Roup is a contagious disease, so the whole place must be thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. Better kill and burn the carcasses of every bird that is badly affected. Wash feed pans and water dishes in strong soda and boiling water. If the house has an earthen floor, scrub off about an inch of the surface, burn, and fill in with fresh material. Give the whole house—walls, ceiling, perches and nest boxes—a thorough sluicing with whitewash which has been mixed with scalded milk, and two ounces of carbolic acid and half a cup of salt added to each pailful. Use raw mixture quite hot, and don't spare it. Swish lots of it into all corners, cracks and crevices, and if it is possible, keep the birds out of the house for twenty-four hours, and scatter quicklime over the floor; of course being careful to cover it all up before the birds are let into the house again. WE haven't had any poetry for ages, have we? So here is a special favorite of mine and one that is particularly appropriate to the season. The writer, Joyce Kilmer, lost his life during the great war, but his poem will live on forever in the hearts of all nature lovers.

"I think that I shall never see
A poem lovely as a tree.
A tree whose hungry mouth is prest
Against the earth's sweet flowing breast;
A tree that looks at God all day,
And lifts her leafy arms to pray;
A tree that may in summer wear
A nest of robins in her hair;
Upon whose bosom snow has lain,
Who intimately lives with rain.
Poems are made by fools like me,
But only God can make a tree."

TROUBLED, Ind.—It isn't necessary for you to renounce all thought of marriage in order to devote your life to "definite work in the service of God," for "motherhood is a partnership with God," and the girl who strives to be a good wife and mother really does a "definite" work. The feeling of superiority you have for the young man in question is due, largely, to your youth and the inability of youth to appreciate true worth. The average girl at some time in her life has that superior feeling. You should be thankful that he is "just a common boy." Some great man once remarked that "God must have loved the common people best because he made so many of them."

BLUE-EYED BEAUTIES, Minn.—What should girls of fourteen and fifteen do when their "bows" go back on them? They should study their grammar, spelling book and dictionary first of all. (2) It isn't proper for girls of your age to have even one fellow, to say nothing of more than one. (3) Men's hearts aren't easily broken, so you are safe enough in refusing to marry someone you don't love. (4) What does it mean when a young man steps on your toes? It means that he is awkward and that you should keep out of his way.

CHUMS, Ind.—When two young men, even "handsome and stylish ones," call on two nice girls every Sunday evening all winter and then never take them anywhere, though they go themselves, the girls are justified in seeking more generous sweethearts. "Them's my sentiments."

SUNSHINE, Ind.—Your parents are the ones to decide. If they fully approve of your marriage, the time you mention would be exceptionally appropriate. It isn't improper to keep your engagement a secret—if you can.

FANNIE, N. Mex.—Men of 41 are supposed to have better judgment than girls of 18, and this man is showing excellent judgment in not allowing your friendship for each other to amount to anything more serious. I agree with your brother that he is too old for you.

EVA AND GRACE, S. C.—You must have an indulgent father to let you have men callers at all and he isn't being unreasonable when he insists that they go home at 10.30.

JOSEPHINE, Mich.—Go to high school, by all means.

SWEET SIXTEEN, Wisc.—If you don't like your widowed brother-in-law and your parents don't like him and he is set in his ways and jealous and won't go to parties with you and doesn't want you to go, why, oh why, do you ask me if you should marry him? It is just as plain as the nose on your face that you shouldn't.

GERTRUDE, Colo.—Your mother should know of your friendship with this young man and she is the one to decide whether or not you should continue to receive his attentions. Don't believe anything against him until it is proven. (2) It is very unladylike for girls to scuffle with boys, and still more unladylike to shimmy. (3) It isn't wrong for you to give your photograph to boys but it is very unwise. Photographs shouldn't be scattered around recklessly.

LONELY GIRL, Miss.—The young man showed good judgment in suggesting that each keep all presents, for the puff box, or whatever he gave you, would be as useless to him as the necktie you gave him would be to you. If you want him to come back again and he wants to, I don't see why it wouldn't be quite all right.

ELLA Ill.—Never mind what your friends say—if you don't want a beau don't have one. Stick to your girl chum until you meet a man who really interests you.

CHUMS, N. C.—You don't value yourselves very highly, do you, if you say you are treated nicely by young men who are intoxicated, ever so slightly, when they come to see you? I should consider that an insult. (Wonder where they get it?) You bring unkind criticism upon yourself by associating with them if their associates are regarded as cheap and immoral.

CURLY HAIR AND BLUE EYES, Ark.—It is unfair for one girl to try to take another girl's beau, and it would be twice as unfair for two girls to try it; and what would you do with him after you got him? Chop him into two pieces or take turns having him? Be good sports and let her keep him. Maybe you couldn't get him anyway.

LITTLE BOY, S. C.—And so you want me to write you a "long, sweet letter." Dearie, I don't write long, sweet letters anyway, and if I were addicted to l. s. l. I'd never, never write one to a strange young man. I've always advised my girls not to and while I'm not a shy young thing of sixteen I'm not elderly enough to write a sweet letter to a man of twenty-eight. If you are that old and don't know how to love a girl, I'm not equal to telling you. Doubtless the old maid you mention would be a better wife than the sixteen-year-old girl who is very beautiful; but stick to one—whichever one you marry.

M. D. F., Texas.—Yes, you are too young to have a "sure enough sweetheart," or to know the meaning of love. Don't write any more letters to the boy in question and don't let him kiss you any more. If he wants to know why, tell him frankly and also add that you are too young to care for anyone, and treat his pet names and love making as a joke.

R. F., Ala.—I'm not an authority but to my mind a correspondence course in nursing would be impractical and a waste of time. I'd hate to have a correspondence school nurse take care of me if I were seriously ill. Just supposing she got your appendix half out and then mislaid her book, Lesson 43, What To Do Next. Most hospitals prefer, and even insist upon, high school graduates, but doubtless there are hospitals that would waive that rule if they found you intelligent and in earnest about the work.

GERTRUDE, Ga.—You are too young to marry—even if he has promised to give you "half of his wages every pay day," and you don't love him enough to marry him even if you were older. Just "some" isn't enough.

BRUNETTE, N. C.—Parents are usually right and it is up to the young man to clear himself of any false accusations and then they can't object.

BLONDE, N. C.—I suppose girls of seventeen have really been in love but the average girl of that age, and sometimes years older, is in love with love and not with the man. If you are of a changeable nature it is better not to marry.

N. C. TWINS.—Let them go see the other girls if they want to. Callers three nights a week is three nights too many for high school girls. One evening might not be so worse if your parents don't mind.

WILD ROSE, Texas.—I'm not a "sweet old dear," as you seem to think, but I'm sure I'd like to have you hug me. It is better not to write "notes" in school but youngsters will do it. I used to, and I suppose my mother and grandmother did, and doubtless my children would, if I had any. Don't write anything that you wouldn't be willing to have read before the school. I have known teachers to do that.

IRENE, Ind.—If your teacher were to show you marked attention he would be severely criticized by the people and school board and, perhaps, lose his position. He is a wise young man to remain good friends with all the girls.

GREY-EYED GIRL, Ky.—If you think that I'll "aggree" with you that mothers don't know best "all ways," you have another think coming. Don't kiss him, even if he is "hansom." Poor little girl! She never had a spelling book or dictionary in all her life, did she?

I've been as mild and springlike as one could wish, haven't I? That's so you'll know I'm not a cross old thing all the time. Why, I really believe I could be induced to go "hanging Maybaskets," or do the young people do that any more?

Everyone His Own Manufacturer

"On the old frontier there were no blacksmith shops, no tanneries, no stores of any sort, all utensils were either made by the pioneer or purchased from some wandering Indian trader. But money was almost an unknown article among the hardy Buckskins, hence they either traded pelts for goods or went without, consequently their ingenuity and skill was highly developed and they sometimes even made their own guns and knives.

"The famous Bowie knife was not invented by Colonel Bowie but was made by a blacksmith from Philadelphia for the doughty Colonel and adopted by the latter whose name the weapon still bears. Colonel Bowie, by the way, did give the smith a pattern drawn on brown paper, but when the knives were finished he chose the design made by the smith."—Dan Beard in Boys' Life for November.

SAGE TEA TURNS GRAY HAIR DARK

If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody can Tell.

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome. Nowadays, by asking at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," you will get a large bottle of this famous old recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, at a small cost.

Don't stay gray! Try it! No one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy and attractive.

The Family Doctor

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. R. D., Mt. Vernon, Ohio.—Black spots always float in near-sighted eyes. They are due to eating too much meat at times, and, at times, come with age. The ringing of the ears is due to some catarrhal condition of the ears. Consult a specialist about both conditions. The loss of hair may be due to some blood trouble. Have the blood examined and the exact cause ascertained.

MRS. G. G. S., Kensington, Ky.—Have the lumps removed by electricity. This is the only sure cure.

MRS. J. W. J., Doerum, Ga.—For your high blood pressure use five-drop doses of iodide of potassium, well diluted, after meals. Increase this dose by one drop daily. Keep your bowels free, always. Drink plenty of water, and for a short time live on skimmed milk, using a quart of the milk daily, only, and a small amount of well-cooked rice three times a day. Of course you should exercise, and in every way try to promote your peripheral circulation.

MRS. H. G. G., Clarksburg, West Va.—Examination of the urine chemically and microscopically is the only way to determine condition of the kidneys and indirectly the cause of the eye trouble mentioned. Bright's disease does affect the eyes, even to blindness.

MRS. J. W. R., Knoxville, Tenn.—Your neuritis is due probably to chronic malaria. Take either some three-grain quinine pills or a tablespoonful of Warburg's tincture in water after meals. The latter remedy is to be preferred.

MISS M. M., Fresno, Cal.—You had better have the hemorrhoids operated on at once, and, in the meantime, drink plenty of good spring water and take for the acidity of the urine, which causes the frequent urination, three-grain doses of urotropin after meals.

MRS. L. G., Clarksville, Mo.—Have your back ironed with the flatiron. First apply to the back three or four thicknesses of flannel which have been soaked in hot mustard water, then apply the hot iron sufficiently to steam the back without burning the skin. For the rheumatic condition and pain in the legs, back, etc., use five-grain doses of salicylate of soda after meals. Drink plenty of good spring water—not less than two quarts a day.

MRS. H. D., Fay, Okla.—You had better consult a specialist for the baby. He is not getting the proper food and this can only be determined by actual examination and then several changes of food must be tried to get the right one in a given case.

MISS B. J., Taylor, Texas.—Use five-grain tablets of urotropin, after meals, for the frequent urinating.

MISS G. S., Clarissa, Minn.—Have the warts removed by electricity. This is the best way and leaves no scar.

MRS. C. S., Caro, Mich.—If you have not had your eyes examined under a mydriatic, such as atropine sulph., you should have your eyes re-examined in this way. Then, if your eyes still trouble you, maybe you have some muscular insufficiency and your eyes do not focus at a fixed point when you read or sew. Muscular insufficiency is one of the great causes of eye strain, and must be corrected by prisms or operation.

MRS. M. M., Columbus, Ohio.—You should have all the spots mentioned removed at once either with the actual cautery or the carbon dioxide snow. Of course, this can only be done by some local surgeon. The "returning scab" on the nose is important, and should have immediate attention.

MRS. E. B. K., Ch., Rhode Island.—Have your blood examined and find out if you have acquired any blood disease. If so, be treated for the blood trouble and you will be all right again.

MRS. W. E. LaG., Potsdam, N. Y.—Your numbness may be due to high blood pressure. Have your blood pressure taken, and find out the condition as existing along this line. In the meantime take one compound cathartic pill at night and rub the offending limb before retiring.

MRS. G. W. C., Hinton, Okla.—For the eczema on the back of your husband's hand use Lassar's paste, to which has been added, thirty grains to the ounce of the paste, boracic acid. Apply at night, and only three times a week. Of course, your husband must live on a simple diet, such as milk and rice, and drink plenty of water.

MRS. J. P., Butte, Mont.—Mucous colitis is not dangerous. It comes from intestinal fermentation. You might try American oil in teaspoonful doses with your meals. Of course, you will not eat anything that you know disagrees with you.

MRS. J. P., Desloge, Mo.—As your health improves, your busts should return to their normal size. There is no real bust developer better than gentle massage of the bust with cocoa-butter.

MRS. J. A. C., Alexandria, La.—Chronic malaria, as you surmise, is the cause of your run-down condition. The one best tonic and remedy for you is Warburg's tincture. You might take a tablespoonful in water after meals.

MISS D. W. B., Marion, Dak.—Remove the blackheads with the comedo extactor, then apply compound lotio alba to the parts, after having bathed the parts in very hot water.

MRS. A. H. M., Kinde, Mich.—The only successful way to remove the birthmark is to have it removed by the use of the actual cautery, in competent hands, or the use of compound dioxide snow by a skilled physician.

MRS. I. M., Okmulgee, Okla.—Operation for the bunions would cure them at once and that, too, without danger.

MISS N. B., Clay City, Ky.—American oil can be obtained at any good drug store.

MRS. N. F., Kite City, Ga.—For excessive sweating and tenderness of the feet, bathe them at night in an eight per cent lotion of salicylic acid. Go without stockings for a while to harden the skin and close up, in a measure, the sweat glands of the feet.

MISS C. E. B., Hallstead, Pa.—For the itching, scaly eruption, wash the skin with soda water. Apply to spots a lotion of two per cent resorcin. Dissolve the resorcin in equal parts of grain alcohol and water.

MR. J. W., Milford, Ill.—For the itching under the arms, apply Lassar's paste to the parts at night.

MRS. A. B. R., Climax, N. C.—Have the enlarged tonsils removed. An enucleation is the best thing for them.

MRS. F. E., Huron, S. Dak.—For the pimples, bathe the face in very hot water and apply lotio alba to the face. Any druggist has the formula and can make it up for you.

MISS E. C., Grey, Ky.—Have the child's tonsils removed at once and save future ear and throat trouble.

MR. F. E. T., Bullbeggerville, Va.—Just ask your druggist for a mixture of rhubarb and soda, and take a teaspoonful after meals.

MRS. G. A., South Hammond, N. Y.—For your rheumatic arms apply chloroform liniment to the arms at night and take five-grain tablets of sodium salicylate after meals.

MISS M. P., Newton, Texas.—You can get Basham's mixture at any good drug store. It should be put up by the druggist or compounded fresh; the preparation changes after a while and therefore should be used only within a short time after it is compounded.

MRS. C. B. K., Ligerwood, N. Dak.—For your general catarrhal condition you should take a one-fourth teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda, dissolved in hot water, before meals, and spray the nose with Dobell's solution three or four times a day.

"Jimmy, how large a piece of cake do you want?"

"I want a big piece, but don't gimme so much that I'll have to divide with sister."

Driven Apart

By chance the shifty lawyer had encountered Neil. Trenwyck had joined the throng which was hurrying toward the ferry, bound across the bay. Drawing the man apart, Neil surveyed him fiercely.

"I—I thought, up to last night," faltered the lawyer, paling under the hostile look the other gave him, "that you had lost your life in that Sutter Street house."

"Oh, you did!" returned Neil. "And what caused you to change your opinion?"

"I called at your cousin's, on Nob Hill, and—and saw your mother. She told me that you had escaped, and were even then in your cousin's house."

"What else did my mother tell you?" demanded Neil. The lawyer hesitated, and the young man leaned toward him and hissed: "You had better be frank with me, Trenwyck. You are well enough acquainted with the law to know that, for crimes such as you and Gorsline have committed, you can be brought to account. What else did my mother tell you?"

"Why, that Beryl Gray——"

"Mrs. Preston, if you please," interrupted Neil. "She told me, then, that your wife and a dark-complexioned girl, who looked like a Mexican, had called at the house just before I came. She had told them that you had gone to Oakland——"

"To Oakland!" exclaimed Neil, with white lips. Could his mother, whom he reverenced in spite of her haughty pride, have descended to such a heartless subterfuge as that?"

"Yes," went on the lawyer glibly. "The two girls had just gone away, she said, and she wanted me to follow them and learn where they went."

"You followed them?" asked Neil, a savage glint in his eyes.

"Your mother's wish, Mr. Preston, is law to me."

"It means money to you as well, you cowardly spy! Go on! You followed my wife and her friend. Where did they go?"

The lawyer had followed them, picking up the trail every time he lost it, and finally watching while the soldier conducted them to a tent in Lafayette Park. He had reconnoitered the tent, and was busy with his nefarious work when a soldier discovered him and fired a shot. Trenwyck escaped the bullet, glided through the shadows to a large tree in the center of the park, and to the trunk affixed one of a number of cards which he was carrying in his pocket. Then he had vanished into the night.

"I do not know where they went," replied the lawyer, "but I believe they have gone to Oakland."

Neil glared into the man's eyes.

"Trenwyck, I believe you are lying!" he cried.

"So help me Heaven, Mr. Preston——"

Before the lawyer could finish, Preston had grabbed him by the throat. The man stumbled from the suddenness of the attack and fell into the street.

"Get up!" ordered Preston curtly, releasing the man and rising to his own feet.

As the lawyer arose, Preston's eyes alighted on two cards which lay on the stones and had fallen from Trenwyck's pocket. The lawyer recovered them hastily—his very haste arousing Neil's suspicions. Catching the man's hand, Neil wrenched one of the cards away.

On the square piece of pasteboard was the following:

"BERYL: If you see this, come at once to 149 J Street, Oakland. You will find me there, lonely and heartbroken. NEIL."

Neil was furious. His hand clenched as though he would deal the scoundrelly lawyer a blow, and the other cringed before him and abjectly cried out for mercy.

"You contemptible cur!" shouted Neil. "I could kill you for this piece of treachery!"

"Be careful, sir!" said the lawyer, pitifully frightened. "Don't forget that I saved your life in that Sutter Street house!"

"You did that through cowardice! You shirked consequences that Gorsline was willing to face. What have you been doing with these cards?"

"Posting them in the different refugee camps."

"Did—did my mother——"

The words froze on his lips.

"Your mother had nothing to do with it, and does not know anything about it."

"For whom are you acting? Whose base plan is this? Tell me," Neil commanded, his voice tense and fraught with terrible meaning, "and be sure you speak the truth."

"Berdyne," replied Trenwyck.

"That monster! That inhuman scoundrel! He is in Oakland?"

"Yes."

"And he would lure my darling there! Oh, the infamous wretch!"

Neil was shaking with fury. His voice choked with the wrath that filled him; and then, as if by magic, he grew calm as a terrible purpose formed in his brain.

"Come with me," he said, seizing Trenwyck by the arm; "you and I will go to this place in Oakland together. All I ask under heaven is to be brought face to face with Berdyne!"

Together they joined the drifting crowd of refugees bound for the Market Street ferry, Neil all on fire with a desire for vengeance, the lawyer ghastly pale with fear and apprehension. Alas! if Neil had only known, that trap was laid for him as well as for Beryl.

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 8 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 334, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

L. V., Pennington, Texas.—If all the poetry which is being written in the United States could be turned into money it would create a fund sufficient to pay interest on the nation's Liberty Bonds. Unfortunately, there is no market for this flood of verse; magazines use little or none, and newspapers when they print rhyme do so generally without reimbursing the poet—or causing him to be in any way punished. We are sorry that we can offer you no more encouragement than these hard facts, nor offer you aid in turning your verses into useful cash.

W. A. H., Broughton, Ill.—President Wilson's Cabinet has been one of many changes, which have not yet ceased. At present writing, the make-up of the President's advisors is as follows: Secretary of State, Bainbridge Colby of New York; Secretary of Treasury, David F. Houston of Missouri; Secretary of War, Newton D. Baker of Ohio; Secretary of Navy, Josephus Daniels of North Carolina; Secretary of Interior, John Barton Payne of Illinois; Secretary of Agriculture, E. T. Mitchell Palmer of Pennsylvania; Postmaster-General, Albert S. Burleson of Texas.

P. P., Beaver Dam, Ky.—See answer to W. A. H., Broughton, Ill., in this column.

N. R., Briercrest, Sask.—The bride should have the articles marked with the initials of her full maiden name. (2) The same thread may be used as for ordinary yokes.

G. B., Gilman, Ia.—Students at the U. S. Naval Academy are styled midshipmen. Five midshipmen are allowed for each Senator and Representative and appointment is made after competitive examinations, the holding of which is entirely in the hands of the Senator and Representative having the power. You should therefore apply directly to your Senator or Congressman, telling him that you would like to try the next examination he holds for Annapolis appointments. Sometimes these Senators and Representatives will nominate without holding these examinations. You will understand that securing a nomination through your Senator or Congressman does not mean that you become at once a midshipman. It is necessary that you pass the rather difficult Annapolis entrance examinations, which are held twice a year—on the first and third Wednesdays in February and on the second Wednesday in April. You would have to be not less than sixteen nor more than twenty years of age on April 1st of the year you enter the academy. You must pass a satisfactory physical examination and comply with certain height and weight requirements, depending upon your age at entrance. You may, if you wish, write to the Superintendent of the U. S. Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md., for further information.

M. M., Kenton, Tenn.—We cannot refer you to any firm dealing in "mineral rods," because we have often explained in this column that such devices are useless frauds. The only gold they find is that in the pockets of credulous buyers who give up hard-earned money to possess something which has no "divining" qualities whatsoever. Fortunes are not found at the end of a stick—no matter how the stick is named—but they are found as the result of honest, persistent work, done without a hope of getting something for nothing.

M. R., Tecumseh, Kans.—See answer to M. M., Kenton, in this column.

D. V. J., Yulee, Fla.—See answer to M. M., Kenton, Tenn., in this column.

A HOMESEEKER, Middle Brook, Ark.—The climate of Oregon is distinctly a salubrious one, and the winters are not severe. This is particularly true of that part of the state known as the Rogue River section, where much fruit, grapes being a heavy crop, is raised. West of the Cascade Mountains is the Willamette Valley, which is sixty miles wide by a hundred and fifty long. The land of this valley is extremely fertile, and lumber is produced from trees of gigantic size. Toward the coast there is a very heavy rainfall of 70 to 80 inches. This rainfall is greatly reduced in the central and eastern portions of the state. Oregon has made great strides in the past decade, having been aided by her natural resources and the enterprise of her progressive citizens.

K. H., Hightown, Va.—No; girls are not employed to drive taxicabs and motortrucks in the cities of this country. Neither are girls taking up cattle herding as a profession in the West. We are sure you will find milder occupations than these, and ones whose duties will be much more pleasant.

MRS. S. L. J., Bonifay, Fla.—The only way you can possess a family "coat of arms" is to employ a professional genealogist to search out the far roots of your family and see if you are entitled to any heraldic device. Quite a few good Americans, one of whom was Abraham Lincoln, have found no difficulty in existing creditably without borrowing from old Europe for ancient and outworn devices, so do not be discouraged if a search should show you that you were not entitled to share the arms of European knighthood or nobility.

MRS. G. M. E., Grampian, Pa.—So far, medical science has developed no successful method of dealing with cancer. The knife gives the only results which are temporarily sure. Radium has been used experimentally by various of our large medical institutions, and it has been thought that the rays of the new mineral had in some instances beneficial effects. We can only suggest that if your relative is afflicted with this unfortunate disease, she place herself in the best of some of our large city hospitals for treatment or operation such as the physicians may think best.

W. T. H., Dorena, Mo.—Arkansas is a splendid agricultural state, being well-watered by numerous streams and with an average rainfall of about 45 inches. The summer season is long and the winters short and mild. The eastern part of the state is low and level, containing a great deal of land which has been drained. Much of this land is used for rice culture. The central and western parts of the state are hilly and diversified. There are only 300,599 acres of vacant public land in the state of Arkansas. Regarding this, write to B. F. Squires, Register of U. S. Land Office, Little Rock, Ark.

MRS. J. C. R., Narrows, Ala.—The occurrence of the five Sundays in February which are in this year's calendar will not take place again until 1948.

R. L. S., Starkey, Ore.—Common solder should not be used for the repair of your galvanized tank. You should procure what is known as "soft solder" for this purpose.

Business

The tail-ender of the sales force who had been sitting around hoping that business would spruce up, put this question to the star salesman of his concern:

"How do you manage to get so many orders, while I don't seem to get any at all?"

"Well," said the other, dropping his voice to an impressive whisper. "I make it a point to wear out the soles of my shoes instead of the seat of my trousers."—Boys' Life for December.

A Velvet Soft Skin

Is Always A Charm

Keep Away The Wrinkles. Mix Your Toilet Preparations At Home.

By Madame Maree

TO retain a youthful complexion, or to revive a neglected one, is only a matter of daily care, together with good toilet preparations.

Here are some home mixed creams and hair beautifiers that are recommended as having been tested and tried for many years.

A Cream to Tighten the Skin and Remove Wrinkles

It is really inspiring to know that removing wrinkles now depends almost entirely upon yourself. It will take but a few moments for you to make a mixture of two ounces of eptol, a little water and glycerine. The eptol can be obtained from your druggist for fifty cents. This cream produces startling changes in the skin in a short time. It will make you look many years younger if you will only use it faithfully.

A Cream to Fade Out Blemishes

By the use of this cream you will soon find that all red spots, freckles, all muddiness and sallowness will have disappeared completely, leaving the skin pure and clear as a lily. You cannot get this result except by mixing one ounce of zintone with a little glycerine and hot water. The zintone costs fifty cents at the drug store.

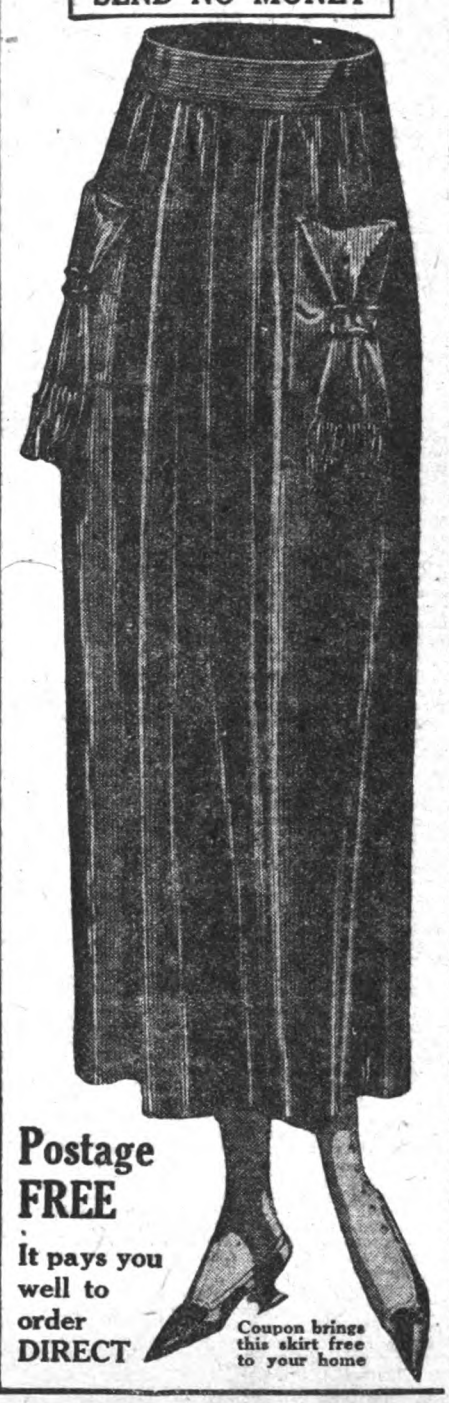
Blackheads Go in a Few Minutes

It is only a question of a few moments to get rid of blackheads. The best thing to use is neroxin. You sprinkle a little neroxin on a wet cloth or sponge and rub the blackheads with this for a few moments. This is a very remarkable article, and you need no longer use tonics, face-steaming, and pinching, and other useless methods. The neroxin sells for fifty cents.

For a Shampoo.

Just buy a twenty-five cent package of eggol and dissolve it in hot water as you need it. This is far better than soap.

To Remove Superfluous Hair



There is a very remarkable way to remove superfluous hair. Simply moisten the hairs with a little sulfo solution. The hair begins to shrivel. You can see them dissolve, and with just a swish of the finger, all the hairs can be rubbed off clear and clean. It will cost one dollar at any drug store, and will last for a considerable time.

For a Dependable Hair Invigorator

You can easily prevent hair from falling, and you can make it grow thick and luxuriant by a very simple method. The invigorator is made by adding one ounce of beta-quinol to a half pint of water and a half pint of bay rum. If you prefer you may use a full pint of witchhazel instead of the water and bay rum. The beta-quinol may be procured for fifty cents at any drug store.

NOTE—The articles mentioned herein have come into such demand because of their effectiveness that you can obtain them at any drug store. But if your druggist cannot supply you, arrangements have been made to send any of these articles by mail, charges paid, on receipt of price, by addressing "Secretary to Madam Maree, 589 Thompson Building, Chicago.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

MRS. L. H. T., Wisconsin.—If you wish to discontinue your subscription to the paper you mention, you should notify the publisher, and refuse to take the paper from the post office.

MRS. P. W., Minnesota.—We are of the opinion that the laws of your state provide aid to a widowed mother with children under 14 years of age, who on account of poverty is unable to care properly for her dependent or neglected children, but who in all other respects is a fit guardian for such children; we think the application should be made to your county court; we think the amount of such allowance would depend upon circumstances not stated in your communication.

MRS. H. G., Washington.—Remarriage by either party, during the lifetime of the husband or wife in case there is no divorce, is illegal and would subject the guilty party to punishment for bigamy.

MRS. J. M. N., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and children, his widow would receive dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and one third of the personal property absolutely, the balance going in equal shares to his children; the share of the widow in the personal property would, upon his subsequent death, without a will, go to her children, but her dower in the real estate would die with her, and the remainder interest in such property would revert to her husband's children; the shares of the heirs at law and next of kin are subordinate to the claims against the estate and the expenses of administration; we think a claim for the care and nursing of the wife is a probable claim against the husband's estate; we think it would simplify matters for the man you mention to adjust the amount of pay the woman who attends his wife is to receive, while he is living, as such claims are often a cause of expense if left for settlement afterwards.

MRS. A. W., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his widow would receive one half of his estate, the balance going to his parents, brothers and sisters, depending upon who is left; if none such, the whole estate would go to the surviving widow. (2) We do not think you can, by will, bar your husband from a one-half interest in your real estate in Kansas, provided he survives you and provided he at sometime since the marriage has been a resident of that state.

R. S. P., Texas.—If your husband deserted you, without a good cause, we think you are legally entitled to support from him; we think, however, that it will be necessary for you to locate him before you can enforce your claim.

MRS. N. L., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that in case of the separation of the parents, the custody of the children is a question for the court to decide after the submission of evidence as to what would be for the best interest of such children. (2) Under the laws of your state, children may be disinherited by will.

J. H., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and three children, his widow would receive certain small allowances from the personal property and in addition thereto one third of the real and personal estate, the balance going in equal shares to his children.

MRS. M. C., Washington.—Under the laws of Missouri, we are of the opinion that if the property you mention stood in your father's name, it would have been necessary for your mother to have survived him to have acquired any vested interest therein, and that upon her death before the death of your father, he had a legal right to dispose of the property.

L. B., Wyoming.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the failure to record a deed to property would not affect the grantee's title to the property, unless such title was attacked by the holder of a subsequent deed in the hands of a bona-fide purchaser without notice; we think, however, there must be a delivery of such deed in order to make it valid.

MRS. G. W., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your father left no will, his property, after payment of debts and expenses, would go one third to your mother and the balance in equal shares to his children, the share of any minor child being paid to a general guardian; we think an administrator should be appointed to administer the estate under bond, and upon the expiration of the proper period for such administration, the administrator could be compelled to account and to pay over the shares to the persons entitled to receive them.

F. E. D., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the estate of an intestate would go one third to the surviving spouse and the balance in equal shares to the children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share; if such intestate leaves no surviving spouse and no child or descendant, we think his estate would go to his parents.

W. H. P., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that such real estate as stands in your husband's name will, upon his death, if he leaves no will, go to his daughter by the former marriage subject to your right of dower of a one-third interest for life; in case you survive him, you would also be entitled to certain allowances from his personal property and in addition thereto a one-third interest absolutely. We do not think your son by a former marriage will have any interest in your husband's estate, unless some provision is made for him by will.

W. F. B., Colorado.—If the firm from which you purchased the goods you mention refuses to either return your money or send you the goods, we think you should make your complaint to the postal authorities.

F. M. S., Texas.—We are of the opinion that the laws of Alabama require that a will be witnessed by two competent uninterested witnesses in order to make the same a valid will, that children may be disinherited, and that the grounds upon which a contest of a will may be based are, lack of testamentary capacity, undue influence, that the will was not legally drawn or executed or that it did not express testator's true intent; if, however, the will you mention was proved a long period of years ago, we think you will now have difficulty in setting same aside, unless you can conclusively establish some fraud in connection therewith. We do not think the holder of the first mortgage against the property you mention can be compelled to pay the second mortgage upon the property, unless there is some circumstance in connection with the transaction not stated in your communication to us.

A. E. B., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a second mortgage is subordinate in lien to the first mortgage upon the property, and that its value is entirely dependent upon the value of the property and the amount of the first mortgage; if the property has sufficient value to pay the entire lien of the first mortgage with enough left over to meet the second mortgage claim, the second mortgage would, of course, be all right, but in loaning upon a second mortgage you should bear in mind that the first mortgage may be enforced against the property at some inopportune time or under disadvantageous circumstances or in some manner in which the property might sell for much less than its true value. (2) We think that a promissory note would be a proper claim to be proved against a decedent's estate, unless there is some circumstance in connection with the note affecting its validity.

L. H., Wisconsin.—If your father will give you a vested remainder interest in his property, such interest can be disposed of by you, by will or otherwise, or if undisposed of at the time of your death the same will go to your heirs at law or next of kin, even though you do not live until the life estate falls in; the period of enjoyment would not, however, be hastened by your death, as neither you nor your legal representatives would be in a position to enjoy the estate until the termination of the life estate. Wills of this nature cannot be too carefully drawn as the question of the vesting of remainders is very puzzling and there is a great deal of law upon the subject. You should have the will in question examined by some competent and experienced lawyer in order to determine whether your interest in the estate is a vested one, not subject to being divested upon your death in case you should predecease the life tenant.

S. P., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the wife's acknowledgment to a deed, where the same is necessary, must be made in the absence of her husband, and made upon her declaration that the same is made of her own free will, and that the officer taking such acknowledgment must certify that she made such declaration to him.

M. J. S., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the child, by a former marriage, of the first wife of the man who died, would have very little chance of proving a claim against the estate of the man who died, based upon the fact that the mother of such child gave this man her share of her former husband's estate at the time of her marriage to this man who has recently died.

J. N. H., Oklahoma.—An examination of your local records, and a knowledge of the facts in connection therewith, would be necessary in order to determine whether you hold a good title to the land you mention.

Manners and Looks

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

M. W., Adrian, Minn.—In your conversation with your physician, give him his professional title and address him as "Doctor" or "Doctor Blank." Your nurse should speak to you as "Miss Dash."

N. F. K., Martinsville, O.—It is neither correct nor graceful for a girl to sit with her legs crossed. However, in these days when women smoke, vote and serve on juries, they may yet demand the right to put their feet up on the back of a chair and a black cigar in their mouth.

ONE IN DOUBT, Oneida, N. Y.—You may wear your veil at your church wedding. (2) A wedding gown would be a poor affair without a proper train.

WANT TO KNOW.—We do not see how you can wear your engagement ring if you do not mean to announce your engagement. (2) The enclosure of an "at home" card with the wedding announcement means that the bride and groom will be glad to see at their new home those to whom the cards go. (3) We do not know upon just what terms you are with this stepmother who "does not love" you; we therefore cannot tell you how you may decide your last inquiry.

MRS. M. C., Swanton, Vt.—In the case you mention, if your husband objects to this man and does not wish you to write to him, we believe you should promptly cease the correspondence. That the man is your cousin has no particular bearing on the matter. If you care for your husband and the happiness of your new home, you should be glad to comply with your husband's wish in the matter.

I. K., Livermore, Ky.—The electric needle for the removal of hair from the skin may only be employed by a competent dermatologist such as may be found in the large cities. Useful and fairly successful compounds for the removal of superfluous hair may be purchased at any good pharmacy. (2) If you have your graduation frock white and simple and girlish, you need not worry if it be the most "stylishest" one on the stage, for you will be sure to look happy and charming in it.

SUNBEAM, Hubbard, Texas.—No girl should marry at sixteen, which is yet a schoolgirl age. Stick to your schoolbooks for three or four years more, and you will be a better and happier wife when you do marry.

F. D., Delafield, Ill.—If your parents have no objections to this young man, you may permit him to act as your escort home from church and other affairs.

B. B., Charleroi, Pa.—A young man should escort a girl from her home to a "show," and not ask her to meet him in front of the place of entertainment.

A DULL BOY, Twitty, Texas.—It is often a dangerous and unhappy experiment to leave a good farm home expecting to find an easier and better life in the city. In your case, however, you are legitimately restless, and seem free to go if you wish. Your earlier education should help you some toward making your way in town—where, you must remember, you will meet the competition of the thousands there and those constantly arriving. We suggest that you definitely plan for a trial trip to the new life—and do not shake yourself loose entirely from your big farm which you have helped to earn.

IN TROUBLE, Palmer, Tenn.—You should be paying no serious attention to a girl of fourteen, and we cannot imagine why her parents "do not object," as you say. That this child slapped your face while in a rage, is no evidence that she might not make a very good-tempered wife when five or ten years older.

BLUE EYES, Texas.—Yes, a bride may wear her engagement ring at the ceremony.

J. W. McC., Lacenter, Ky.—All we can say about a young lady writing you a letter and using both red and black ink, is that she showed rather poor taste, but that she meant nothing more sentimental than if she had used plain black alone. (2) A girl of seventeen who will "engage her company" to two young men for the same Sunday afternoon is simply arranging the ground for a lively Sabbath—provided the two young men furnish the proper entertainment.

PEGGY, Hickory, N. C.—Sixteen is too young for lovers or love letters. From letters received, this department knows how many unhappy marriages have occurred where the girl was too young to know her own mind—and found it out too late. Marriage is a serious game and not to be played at by children.

BESSIE, Hickory, N. C.—You may have just as many "beaux" at one time as you wish—or there are in Hickory. (2) If you are in the habit of calling this boy by his first name, do so in your letter and say, for instance, "My dear Jack." If not, you must say, "My dear Mr. Blank." A proper close is, "Sincerely."

SAD AND SORRY, Westerheim, N. D.—If you have apologized to this young man for your conduct, and he still chooses to act as if he had grievance against you, we can only class him as a bad-tempered chap that you will be well rid of. You certainly cannot make him cease being angry if he is determined to nurse his grievance.

C. M. and M. R., Riviera, Texas.—Girls of thirteen should not be going to dances nor should they go to any entertainment away from home unless carefully chaperoned. You are but children, and must obey your parents in every way. Stick to your schoolbooks for the next few years and let the boys wait. There will be always plenty of these young animals.

HAPPY WANDA, Westerheim, N. D.—No, a boy must not kiss you while dancing with you nor at any other time. Tell him this and make him see that you mean it. You are too young to be considering a serious love affair or an engagement.

LITTLE THIRTEEN, Garden City, Mo.—When a young man is presented to you at a dance or anywhere else, offer your hand with a bow, a smile and a "How do you do?" This will be quite sufficient and no stilted phrases are necessary.

TROUBLED, Westerheim, N. D.—You are right in believing the "shimmy" to be an improper dance, and you made a mistake in taking any part in it as you did.

C. H., Cabot, Ark.—It is hard for us to advise you regarding your sticking to this suitor who does not seem to have any very clear intention of marrying. We would suggest that you give him one or two rather strong hints that you believe considerable time has been wasted, and, if this fails, try dropping him for a while and letting him see that you receive attention from someone else. Perhaps this might wake him up.

MRS. J. B. L., Milford, Texas.—A woman of twenty-five who is five feet, nine inches in height, should weigh 147 pounds. You are therefore considerably overweight. Any shades of brown and the darker shades of blue should be becoming to your type.

BROWN EYES AND BOBBIE, Everton, Ark.—Young girls should not go any distance away from their own homes unchaperoned. Leap Year has nothing to do with the matter. (2) Yes, you may substitute another escort when the influenza takes away your first suitor.

SIS, West Virginia.—Should conditions at night require it, a young man may offer his arm to the young lady he is escorting. He might say: "I think you had better take my arm."

L. O., Cordell, Ky.—Yes, you may ride a horse to church with your girl friend and this boy. And you may ask this boy in to dinner, if you like.

P. G., Linn Creek, Mo.—Why should you worry about "remaining true" to a man you say you "don't even like"? Let him go and wait and see if this wealthy suitor does not really prove his seriousness. We cannot tell you if he loves you. The difference in your ages is not insurmountable by any means.

Have You Made Your Mother's Dreams Come True? Are You the Strong, Successful Iron Man She Expected You To Be?

or are Worry, Work and Ill-Health Sapping the Iron From Your Blood and Robbing You of the Prizes that Come With Health and Success? Physician Explains Why So Many Men of To-day Need the Help of

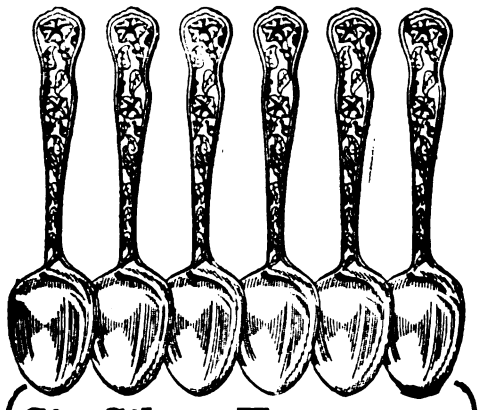
NUXATED IRON TO BUILD RED BLOOD

That Gives Courage and Power To Go In and Win.

Every mother has dreams for her son. And whether it be the mother of the prize-fighter or the statesman, she is equally proud when HE wins. She thinks of HER struggle from the very start to nourish the tiny babe into rugged boyhood—then to build up his health, brawn and brain to fight the battles of young manhood. She did HER best to teach him what health and strength meant in the race for success, and the boy who was able to hold fast to her teachings is today in a position of power.

But there are thousands whose love for their mother is just as deep—thousands who wear the white carnation on Mothers' Day—thousands who never fail to write home—YET they would hesitate to answer the question, "Have You Made Your Mother's Dreams Come True?"—simply because in the mad rush for the Success which they knew would make HER proud, they have slipped up on one point. They have neglected her oft' repeated words: "Look to Your Health First, My Boy." In pushing their mental energies to the limit without the physical strength to back them up, they have allowed worry, work and ill-health to sap the iron from their blood and leave them weak, nervous and run-down. These men are as anxious to get ahead as anyone else but they do not realize that iron is absolutely essential to the greatest development of physical and mental power. But in the wear and tear of modern day life when their forces are constantly drawn upon, they are without the sustaining strength produced by the nourishing foods and outdoor sports of boyhood days that kept up the supply of iron in their blood. Unless they supply this iron deficiency now, they cannot hope to have the rich, red blood that sends fires of energy through body and brain and makes men get ahead. Yet, to take the wrong form of iron may prove worse than useless and therefore physicians below explain why they prescribe only organic iron—Nuxated Iron—for red blood, strength and endurance.

"It is the men of blood and iron who will forge ahead in the business and political life of the country today," says Dr. T. Alphonsus Wallace, a physician of many years' experience and formerly of the British Naval Medical Service. "Without iron there can be no strong, red-blooded men, and unless this strength-giving iron is obtained from the foods we eat, it must be supplied in some form that is easily absorbed and assimilated. For this purpose I always recommend organic iron—Nuxated Iron—which by enriching the blood and creating new blood cells, strengthens the nerves, rebuilds the weakened tissues and helps to instill renewed energy into the whole system whether a person is young or old. In my opinion, Nuxated Iron is the most valuable tonic, strength and blood-builder any physician can prescribe."



Dr. John J. Van Horne, former Medical Inspector and Clinical Physician on the Board of Health of New York City, says, "To help build stronger, healthier men and women, better able physicially to meet the problems of everyday life, I believe that physicians should, at every opportunity prescribe organic iron — Nuxated Iron—for in my experience it is one of the best tonic and red blood builders known to medical science."

Every Man Who Feels the Thrill of Mother-Love Owes it to Himself to Read the Accompanying Article.

No matter what other tonics or iron remedies you have used without success—if you are not strong or well, you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength and see how much you have gained. Nuxated Iron will increase the strength, power and endurance of delicate, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time in many instances.

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended by physicians and which is now being used by over three million people annually, is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated and does not injure the teeth, make them black nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed in this city by all good druggists.

Niagara Grape

For A Club Of Two

We Will Send You Seventeen Apple And Pear Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines!

BY special arrangement with the growers in Michigan we can now offer our readers this grand Fruit and Orchard Collection of 17 Choice Fruit Trees, Berry Bushes and Grape Vines. If planted at standard distances apart they will nicely fill an eighth of an acre. Or they can be planted closer if desired, or they can be made to form a border around your yard or lot. Wherever grown, however, they will yield loads of the finest Apples, Pears, Grapes, Raspberries and Dewberries every year as long as you live. All the varieties in this splendid Collection have been carefully selected for their characteristics of rapid growth, early maturity, immense yield and extreme hardiness. We believe it would be difficult to secure as much actual value from any other assortment of the same size.

Here is what we give you:

One Snow Apple Tree, One Wealthy Apple Tree, One Kieffer Pear Tree, One Bartlett Pear Tree, Two Lucretia Dewberry Bushes, Two Rex Raspberry Bushes, Three Niagara Grape Vines, Three Delaware Grape Vines, Three Concord Grape Vines.

The four grafted Apple and Pear Trees in this Collection are the best that can be procured. They are one foot high, grafted by experts from bearing trees with high records. They will take root as soon as planted and grow rapidly into vigorous healthy trees. You could not get better trees at any price.

The nine Grape Vines are a product of southern Michigan, where the finest grapes in the world are grown. From selected vines, cuttings are taken and buried in underground pits until they undergo a process known as "calllousing." After being properly "calloused" the cuttings will take root as soon as planted. The "calloused" Grape Cuttings in this Collection are all produced in this manner. They will grow rapidly and bear immense crops of choice grapes even sooner than large vines planted at the same time.

The two Raspberry Bushes and two Dewberry Bushes in this Collection are robust, one-year-old youngsters, ready to set out as soon as you receive them. They will begin growing at once and develop into fine, heavy-bearing bushes if given proper attention.

All Will Bear Soon! The garden which you plant with this fine Fruit and Orchard Collection will prove an ever increasing source of pleasure and profit to you year after year. All the trees, vines and bushes will bear fruit in a remarkably short time. The Raspberry will produce some fruit this season. Then next year your Dewberries will commence bearing. The following year you will have grapes and some pears. (A properly cared-for Grape Vine will yield a bushel of grapes every season.) Your Apple and Pear Trees will begin bearing in from three to five years. Then you will have loads and loads of fine fruit in increasing quantity every year.

Guaranteed To Grow! Everything in this Collection is absolutely guaranteed to grow. We stand behind every Collection sent out and the growers in turn stand behind us. You may rest assured that if you order this splendid Collection (and you surely ought to), it will reach you in good condition and grow to your entire satisfaction if the directions for planting are carefully followed. The Modern Farmer

There is nothing better than green corn. The large evergreen varieties are the best. The corn should be planted alongside the pasture so that it can be cut and thrown over the fence, handily.

Or if there is a small lot of a few acres to turn into, there is nothing better than oats and peas for summer pasture. The cattle can be turned onto this as soon as the peas begin to pod and the oats are heading out. Such a pasture will last for three or four weeks, if large enough, and this will give the "old pasture" a chance to pick up, provided, of course, there are seasonable rains. Otherwise, when the oats and peas are gone, the sweet corn will be ready to cut. Feeding of sweet corn can begin as soon as the ears are well formed, even before the corn is large enough for roasting ears.

Other Summer Feeds

Summer silage put up the season before is now largely fed. Green clover, alfalfa or green oat hay are often fed in the barn but this method is rather expensive because so much hauling and handling is required. However, even then it is cheaper in the long run than it is to let the cows dry up in milk and run down in flesh for want of feed.

Clover Silage

In the humid regions it is difficult in wet seasons to cure clover hay. The farmers in these sections have solved this problem by cutting the green clover directly into the silo. They can then begin feeding clover in the barn as soon as feeds get short. Don't let the livestock go hungry in fly time. Plan the pasture now.

Profit in Pigs

Every farmer ought to raise a few pigs, yet there are many farmers in this country, and even in the great grain belt of the Middle West, who do not raise their own meat. They may even raise hogs for market and then buy the majority of their meat. This is a waste, as a little careful thought on the subject will clearly prove.

Why Farmers Should Produce Own Meat

The chief reason why farmers should raise their own meat is that it is economical to do so. Live hogs are now selling around 14 cents a pound at the farm; that is $14 for a hundred pounds live weight. A hundred pounds live weight will make from 75 to 80 pounds of dressed weight or be worth about 18 cents a pound dressed at the farm.

The cost of dressing is no more than the cost of delivering to the local market so that if the farmer now raises his own pork it will be worth to him about 18 cents a pound. Prices on pork produced at the local butcher shops vary all the way from 25 cents for the cheaper cuts up to 50 cents a pound for choice bacon and 75 cents a pound for boiled ham. Pork products that the farmer buys back from the local butcher cost him at least twice what he received for them.

The Reasons Why

There are several good reasons why the price is doubled on his pork after it leaves the farm before it gets back to his table again. In the first place, there is a local dealer who must have pay for his time, rent and other expenses, and the risk he takes against loss in handling the farmers' hogs. Then there is the freight that must be paid to the central market. Here another commission is paid to a commission man who sells the hogs to the packer.

All these items added together increase the price from two to three cents a pound. Besides the hogs have shrunk in weight on the way to market, so that by the time the meat is hung on the packers' hooks it has actually cost 20 to 22 cents a pound instead of the original value of 18 cents a pound on the farm.

What Happens Then

The meat then goes to the coolers, after which it is taken out and cut up and manufactured into the various products: head cheese, jowls, picnic hams, pickled pigs' feet, lard, bacon and hams. Some of the cuts, like ribs and loin, are returned to the freezers and later distributed again to be sold by local butchers. All this costs money, and adds probably another five cents to the price.

But the meat is still in the packers' storage. It must now be taken out and distributed to local storage plants all over the country. From these it is again taken, placed in iced refrigerator cars, called "peddler cars," and "peddled" to the local butchers in the cities and small towns. How much do you suppose these extra items, such as ice, freight and handling over two or three times, adds to the price?

Let us guess two or three cents more. But the local butcher must also buy ice for his shop. He must have pay for his time and interest on his money invested, which adds at least five cents more to the price. Now let us see how the price has gone up without anyone getting a cent that did not rightfully belong to him:

Value of pork on farm where grown, 18 cents a pound.

Value of pork on hooks in packing house, 22 to 23 cents a pound.

Value of pork in local warehouses, 25 cents a pound.

Value of pork on butcher's block, 30 cents a pound.

Thus it will be seen that by the time the pork gets back to the farmer its price has nearly doubled, yet no one has "profiteered."

Why Prices Vary

Some one asks, "What about 40-cent ham or 50-cent bacon?" Why should these cuts cost so much? Because if the butcher fixed the uniform price of 30 cents upon all pork products, everybody would want the hams and bacon and there would be no market for the other cuts, like jowls, feet, belly, liver, sausage and lard. Hence the price on the best cuts are made higher than the average and the poorer pieces are always actually sold for less than half the average cost of the whole carcass.

But this argument is made only to show the farmer that he himself is to blame if he complains about the high price of meat because he can save all these "extra" costs if he will grow and cure his own meat.

Home-made Pork Products

Here are a few choice pork products easily made on the farm: Head cheese, smoked jowl, sugar-cured, pure pork sausage, smoked liver sausage, sugar-cured picnic hams, choice sugar-cured bacon, and, best of all, home-cured hams smoked with cobs or hickory wood. Any of the above smoked products are easily kept in warm weather, and sweet salted pork will keep throughout the year if properly cared for.

How much profit is there in pigs grown especially for providing the family with its year's meat supply? The necessary facts are all given here. Figure it out for yourself.

While Waiting for the Garden to Grow

Very early in the spring before the garden is ready to use, far away from a city market, we can take advantage of many of the so-called weeds which really are splendid edible plants and are delicious for soups, salads and garnish.

Sorrel adds a splendid flavor to soups, or, boiled in salted water, they can be eaten like any greens.

"Lamb-quarter" makes a delicious addition to the family dinner, and what is better than a big dish of dandelions and pork? Curly dock, pigweed, milkweed, plantain—"fiddle head," and, last but not least and best of all, mustard.

Any boy or girl will love an excursion to some spring or creek to bring back the delicious watercress, which makes an appetizing salad that relieves the monotony of the farm dinner.

Skirmish around and see what can be gotten with a little labor. Don't neglect to take advantage of the despised "weed" if it adds a big dish of greens to the family dinner.

How Much Grass Seed to Sow

Spring seeding time is again upon us. The question often arises, what kind of grass seed to sow, how much to buy, or how much to sow per acre. Recently, so many of our readers have sent in inquiries on these matters that we are giving a complete table of the various common grass seeds ordinarily grown together, with the weight per bushel and the number of pounds per acre as recommended by our leading seed men:

Seed.	Pounds to the Bushel.	Sow Per Acre.
Alfalfa,	60	12 to 20 pounds
Red Clover,	60	8 10
Alsike Clover,	60	6 8
Sweet Clover,	60	15 20
Crimson Clover,	60	5 12
Red Top Grass,	14	15 20
Orchard Grass,	14	15 25
Blue Grass,	14	20 40
Sudan Grass,	45	20 25
Timothy,	45	12 15
German Millet,	50	25 30
Hungarian Grass,	48	25 30
Common Millet,	45	25 30

Don't Forget the Flowers

When planning the vegetable garden, don't forget to save some space for flowers. Flowers planted in the garden are easily tended and have a better chance for growth than those that are scattered here and there around the yard. Have the shrubbery and perennials for the yard but put annuals in the garden where they can be cultivated with the vegetables.

Choose Many Kinds

Have a good generous selection so there will be blossoms all the season long till frost comes. There are many very hardy varieties that will blossom very late and are able to withstand the cold.

Be sure to have a lot of the old-time favorites like cosmos, verbenas, asters, poppies, petunias, sweet peas, zinnias, begonias, marigold, corn flowers, nasturtiums, and as many others as you have room for.

Try Some New Flowers

Then try out some of the novelties and specialties. Many of the seed houses have improved varieties that will surprise you. Last year my neighbor had a giant zinnia that was a wonder—some of the blossome were six inches across and of the most beautiful shades. Then she had an improved canterbury bell, cup and saucer, single and triple. Hardly a day passed when these flowers were in bloom that someone did not stop, admire them and ask where she bought her plants. As a matter of fact, she hardly ever buys flower plants but each year tries out, in addition to her regular flowers, some specialty or novelty that is not only interesting but generally a most splendid success which greatly adds to the beauty of her flower garden.

Have All You Want and More

Don't stint on the flowers, they will pay you back in pleasure and added attractiveness of your farm home more than the effort it takes to raise them.

No matter how old a house—just put in the right setting of flowers and shrubs and it becomes a beautiful place, not only to the owner but to every passerby, who cannot help but admire it if surrounded by climbing plants, shrubs and bloom.

Summer-made Manure

Getting out the winter-made manure in spring, work which should never, if at all possible, be left to that time, is such a herculean job that most men give the summer-produced manure not a single thought. They are so very busy from early spring until after harvest, tending and cutting the grain and forage crops, that they are glad if they can find time to merely dump the new lots of manure into the yard and close to the stable where it is made every day. Of course, most of the manure made in summer comes from the horses, for the cows are on grass, but horse manure is well worth saving and it spoils more quickly than does manure from cows and hogs. It "firefangs" or heats and practically burns unless kept shaded, compact and moist. For that reason, summer-made manure should be kept under cover until it can be hauled out and if it can be wetted down now and then so much the better. If that cannot be done, it should be well covered with straw or heaped and covered with earth. It takes time to give such attention, but those who care for every bit of manure made on the farm concede that the work pays well in the long run. Another reason for caring for the manure under cover and away from the stable where it is made is that it keeps flies from breeding in the piles and tormenting stock inside of the stable and out.

One place for the summer-made manure is on green cropping patches which are plowed under now and then during summer, and such plots now are found on every well-managed stock farm. If there is no such use for the manure, then it should go onto the hay meadows and stubbles as soon as their crops are cut; or it may go onto the old, bare-bitten permanent pasture when stock is taken off such places and put on meadows and stubbles that are to be fall plowed. We must say, however, that the meadows and stubbles usually need manure most when they are to be plowed, and can be more readily top-dressed when the land is firm than when soft and wet in spring, or after autumn rains have made plowing possible. The green crops, for soiling or grazing, also will do better if top-dressed with well-made or rotted manure and should also have some artificial fertilizer.

SOWING SUDAN GRASS.—How many pounds of Sudan grass seed should be sown to the acre? How many pounds of the seed in the bushel? When should it be sown and how should the drill be set to sow it?

MRS. H. P., Stella, Mo.

A.—Sudan grass is usually sown at the rate of 20 to 25 pounds to the acre. It weighs 45 pounds per bushel and is sown in exactly the same way as other grass seed, on a well-prepared seedbed after ground is well warmed up—late in May.

GRASS SEED WEIGHTS.—Please tell me the weight per bushel of recleaned herdsgrass seed, also weights of all other grass seeds reclaimed.

F. T. C., R. R. No. 7, Glasgow, Ky.

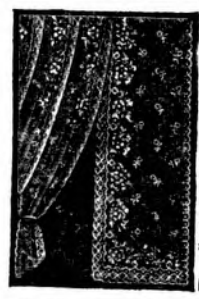
A.—We are printing a table showing pounds of all kinds of grass seed in a bushel according to legal standards established by several states. See another column.

BUTTER WILL NOT COME.—My cow gives rich milk and the cream is fine but it will not make butter. The cream churns to a stiff foam and the butter will not come. I feed her wheat bran and corn meal and shucks. Please tell me the cause of the trouble and what to do. A. H. L., Tar Heel, N. C.

A.—Foamy cream is not caused by the feed, neither is it the fault of the cow. It is due entirely to the temperature of the churn at churning time, which may be either too warm or too cold, and the same result will be obtained. In your case it is probably too warm cream. Suggest you set your cream in cold water for an hour before churning, changing the water frequently and drawing it fresh from the well each time. Better get a thermometer if handy to do so, and churn your cream as nearly at 55 degrees as possible.

Mineral Matter and Milk

Experiments conducted by the Bureau of Animal Industry, United States Department of Agriculture, with dairy cows are showing an important relation between milk secretion and certain mineral substances. Feeding compounds of phosphorus and calcium have resulted in a decidedly beneficial effect on the milk flow in both quantity and fat content.



It has been shown also that a deficiency of phosphorus in dairy rations has a detrimental effect on milk secretion of cows and growth of calves. A remedy was found in the addition of sodium phosphate to rations deficient in phosphorus. The work is being continued.

Magazines Delayed By Slow Mail Service

We are receiving numerous letters from our subscribers complaining of delayed delivery of COMFORT, and we wish to explain that we are not at fault for these delays which are as troublesome to us as they are annoying to our subscribers. Other publishers are experiencing the same or worse difficulties.

In fact these are trying times for publishers contending with shortage of print paper and other obstacles so great that some of the large magazines were forced to skip one or more issues during the past year.

COMFORT has been published regularly and mailed at the usual time every month, except that a part of the March issue was five days late, and part of the April issue three days late in mailing, due to belated shipments of paper.

But these two slight irregularities are not the cause of our subscribers' complaints which have come to us at all seasons of the year and in especially large numbers the past winter claiming long delay in the delivery of their magazine.

These delays, with few exceptions, were caused by the slow and inefficient method by which the bulk of the magazine second-class mail is transported.

Formerly the magazines were carried in the mail cars attached to the regular mail trains, and then we had good and expeditious service.

But the Post-Office Department in recent years has been and still is transporting magazines in freight cars attached to freight trains for long hauls to certain principal points of distribution where they are rehandled and thence forwarded to destination. Besides being slow at its best this method is subject to various irregularities and delays incidental to freight transportation.

We go to press earlier to offset the normal difference in time between freight and regular mail trains but can not overcome the irregularities pecular to this retrograde system of mail service.

We recognize and make due allowance for the fact that the exceptional severity of the past winter has been an impediment to transportation that partly excuses some of the excessive delays of the past few months and we hope that with better weather conditions COMFORT will reach our subscribers more expeditiously.

I cleared myself out of debt this fall. Own 185A ranch some timber and part farm land. Verry healthy here rich land can raise enything no crop failure here whatever we got we got it. But how can I maintain withOut comforter and chimney star in the House. no sengall girls here thos here is to young for mee. I aply to you. There must be someone that is somewhere. I like a lady between twentyfive and forty, wedo lady not barred too children is o.k. I wish a lady with means that can help to start in a Bigar scale of farming. You may publish that is not mention name but aply to COMFORT for my address and you send it to me. Respectfully, HENRY ———.

Henry, COMFORT does not run a matrimonial bureau. That job, which should be in the hands of Uncle Sam, the Red Cross or the Y. M. C. A., unfortunately is left to rascals, who always land in jail. There are too many lonesome men in the West and too many husbandless girls in the East. Until Uncle Sam turns Cupid and gives the homesteader a chance to get wives and the homeless chickens a chance to meet their ideal roosters and settle down in a coop of their own, there will be anguish and heartburnings, yearnings and remorse and the vice market will thrive. In November COMFORT I published a letter written by a young lady in Fort Scott, Ark., a very admirable young lady, I believe, who wanted a husband. That letter has brought me a deluge of mail from hundreds of men who like yourself want a "chimney star." Sorry, boys, but we are not in the chimney star business. A gentleman who had a letter in COMFORT recently and who like myself, was born about the time Pocohontas was vamping John Smith, received a wagon load of mail from ladies, who, though they were not anxious to be his chimney star, were very anxious to have him for a chimney prop. As he has a keen sense of humor, he called on one of these ladies who lived in his vicinity. As a precautionary measure he had two friends wait outside to see that no harm came to him. He had to wait about an hour before the lady appeared, but as he used to be a professional waiter, he did not mind that, and as he is a widower and accustomed to the peculiarities of the gentler sex, he still hung grimly onto his chair, for he was not taking any chances with the sofa. He could hear the powder puff being worked overtime in the adjoining room and also sundry groans as a forty-six inch waist was being squeezed to sylph-like proportions. Then finally the lady appeared. Only for a second did their eyes meet, then she gave a yell and fell in a fit, while he dived through the window. Henry, that is just what would happen if I were to indulge in the business of providing chimney stars, you would get a star all right, but you would have no chimney. You say you are a Sengall man. The nearest approach to Sengall, as far as I know, is to be found in the French West African colony of Senegal. These black gentlemen did valiant service in the war, but they were not so lucky as you, Henry, as most of them got marred by gun, bayonet or gas. However, you will probably experience all these calamities with a few additional ones thrown in for good measure, if you ever have the sublime happiness of acquiring a correspondence chimney star, who will be as busy looking for your money as you are for hers. It seems to me you can raise all kinds of crops except a crop of chimney stars and without that crop all others are worthless. I note, Henry, you are willing to take to your heart a "wedo," otherwise a widow with a ready-made family, which is indeed generous and kind of you. But I also notice that, like most of your kind, the chimney stars you are looking for must have bank accounts. I thought, Henry, you were a regular guy, an honest-to-God he man looking for a helpmeet, a life partner, to whom you could give your heart and lifelong devotion, but, alas, you fail to measure up to these standards and you disdain love and chimney stars unless they can come across with the long green and the fat wads. Love that must, before it is acceptable, be gilded with filthy lucre, is a delusion and a snare, and I don't wonder, if monied matrimony is your object, that you are still a Sengall man, and until you are ready to mate on a basis of true love, respect and affection, I hope you will remain one. Do not worry, Henry, neither your name or address will be given to any aspiring chimney star. Aspirants for that honor prefer to put their money in a bank and not a chimney.

Comfort for Stock in Summer

THE merciful man will try to make the hot days and nights of summer as comfortable as possible for his animals. It is the height of cruelty to keep a mare and foal on short dry pasture without shade. Flies torture and the mare cannot be expected to give sufficient milk, nor can the foal develop properly. So much the worse if drinking water is inadequate, and that often is the case in such pastures. Let the mare have a clean shed to run to for shelter and allow free access to drinking water. Also feed extra hay, or green stuff and grain, if the pasture is short. It also is poor policy to let the young foal run with its dam when she is working in the field or hauling a load to town. The foal is a nuisance at such times, drinks milk from the heated mare and may lose hair as a result of the indigestion so caused. If the work mare has a foal, stable the latter and bring the mare to it now and then for nursing. When the mare comes in hot at noon milk her nearly dry and let her cool off while eating a pound or so of hay before allowing the foal to nurse. Keep the horse stable clean, darkened and screened against flies and also keep the manure away from the doors and windows that flies may not breed there. The worst kind of stinging fly attacks horses in a light, unscreened stable just when they should be resting. To protect against flies when at work, not only put on fly nets or light sheets, but also spray the exposed parts of the body with a reliable fly repellent. Often we have seen netted or sheeted horses come in from work in the summer season with blood streaming from the thin skin of the groin and inner surface of the hind legs. When fly bites cause swellings, bathe them with vinegar and water. If a big bunch forms, paint it with tincture of iodin. Baking soda in soft water also relieves soreness from bites; so does washing blue in water and it is good for bee stings. It does not pay to allow young, growing calves to run on an exposed pasture or even on the front lawn or in the orchard where flies torment or where shade and water happen to be absent. Far better keep the calves in a clean, airy pen in the stable and supply plenty of good feed and an abundance of pure drinking water. In the pen calves cannot contract lung worms and also will put on more flesh and growth than if allowed to graze. Sows and their pigs, on the contrary, should have a succession of new, green pasture lots to graze from early spring until autumn. But shade should be provided and plenty of water. Keep the pigs off old, contaminated pastures and away from surface drinking water and all dirty places and wallows. Then they will not become infested with worms. Lambs, too, should have new grass in spring, if they are to be kept free from worms and therefore comfortable. Pasture the work horses at night in hot weather. Groom them well every day. Provide them with pure drinking water often when at work in the fields and protect their heads from the sun. White sheets on the body also add to comfort.

INDIGESTION.—I have a cow five years old that has spells of gnawing after freshening. When her calf is a week or ten days old she will gnaw on the corners of the barn or anything with which she comes in contact, and she cannot swallow. She appears to be blind, but does not fall down. F. W. W.

A.—At times of derangement of the digestive organs give a pound dose of Glauber salts dissolved in three pints of warm water and add a cupful of blackstrap molasses. Give it slowly and carefully from a long-necked bottle. Feed more carefully, keep the bowels active and have the cow take out-door exercise every day.

DISEASE UNEXPLAINED.—I have a colt that has something the matter with her hind legs. She is two and one half years old. MRS. F. C.

A.—If you care to send us a description of the symptoms of the case we will be glad to give advice but you do not tell us enough to make a diagnosis possible.

SWEENEY.—I have a six-year-old horse that has the "sweeney." Please tell me what I should do for it. T. S.

A.—We cannot prescribe intelligently unless you give us a description of the condition present. For chronic sweeney (wasting of the muscles of the shoulder) the best treatment is to inject a little tincture of iodine under the skin here and there over the wasted surface, by means of a hypodermic syringe. Then lightly rub with the palm of the hand to distribute the tincture. It may be necessary to repeat the treatment several times and it would be best to have it given by a qualified veterinarian.

MILKLESSNESS.—I have a full-blooded Jersey cow six years old. She freshened the first of the year and gives very little milk. She had garget before I dried her off. It has not bothered her since the calf came. I feed her sweet feed and alfalfa hay. She looks fine. MRS. A. E. K.

A.—The attack of garget referred to accounts for the lack of milk flow and it is quite unlikely that the yield will greatly increase before she goes on grass. If she is getting green feed now but does not improve in milk yield it is unlikely that she will do so later and she should not be bred again. If you care to do so, it might be well to add bran, oilmeal, cottonseed meal and hominy or gluten meal to her ration, but we scarcely think it will pay.

WARTS.—I have a good milk cow that has small warts all over her udder. Will you tell me how to remove them without injuring the cow. MRS. H. C.

A.—The usual treatment is to rub in best castor oil or olive oil twice daily, but many dairymen report that they get better results from saturating the affected parts two or three times daily with water containing all the bicarbonate of soda (baking powder) it will dissolve when hot. Warts that have narrow necks may be snipped off with scissors, a few at a time, then apply pine tar the following day.

BULLNOSE.—I have a small pig about seven weeks old that has something wrong with its head. It is between its eye and nose. It is swollen and blue in color and discharges all the time. Can you tell me the trouble? MRS. G. W. S.

A.—The pig evidently is afflicted with necrotic rhinitis, commonly called bullnose or snuffles. It is an incurable, contagious disease and necessitates destruction and burning of affected pigs; then the houses, pens and yards should be put in a sanitary condition under directions of a veterinarian or, better still, new pigs should be given new quarters on new, clean land.

RINGWORM.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my calves? They have a good appetite but are very thin and are stiff in their hind legs, having scaly looking sores on them. The hair is slipping off and they stand and rub or lick themselves nearly all the time. F. F.

A.—Stanchion or tie the calves so that they will be unable to lick themselves. Scrub affected spots clean and free from scabs or crusts and then saturate them once a week with a solution of one pound of sulphate of copper (bluestone) in half a gallon of hot water. Isolate affected calves. Cleanse, disinfect and whitewash the stable and all rubbing places. The disease is due to a vegetable parasite and is contagious.

MAMMITIS.—Please tell me what is wrong with my cow. She is three years old and with calf. One of her front teats is hard to milk and she does not give over three tablespoonfuls of milk at a milking. Sometimes it is like thick, yellow cream. MRS. E. S.

A.—The quarter mentioned has been attacked by mammitis (garget or caked bag), due to infection by pus germs, and the quarter is permanently ruined for normal milk production. You should attempt to dry off the milk secretion in the affected quarter. Rub in warm camphorated oil and fluid extract of belladonna, equal quantities, two or three times daily, and strip at lengthening intervals until milk ceases to secrete. Unless the cow is a fine milker from her sound quarters, she should not be retained for dairying.

INDIGESTION.—I have a mule seven years old that weighs 1,000 pounds. She seems to be in good health but her gums swell up so she can hardly eat corn, and she wants to eat dirt. What causes it and what can I do to prevent it? J. O. T.

A.—"Lampas" is the term applied to the swollen condition of the palate of the roof of the mouth which makes part of it swell beyond the level of the upper incisor teeth. Rub the swelling two or three times daily with a block of alum. Have the teeth put in order by a veterinarian, as sharp points and irregularities cause the irritation of the gums and palate. Give the mule the worm powders often prescribed here and allow access to rock salt.

WOLF IN TAIL.—Will you tell me how to cure a wolf in a cow's tail? MRS. D. O.

A.—A "wolf" or "worm" in the tail is an entirely mythical disease so that treatment is unnecessary. It belongs in the same category as "hollow horn" and the "hooks," which also are mythical diseases believed in by people who also consider the signs of the Zodiac as influencing mundane affairs, which is now known to be nonsense. If you care to send us a description of the symptoms shown by your cow, we will be glad to prescribe treatment.

BLADDER WORMS.—I had a hog that appeared to be in perfect health and fattened well, but when killed there were watery blisters in the small intestines near where they join the larger ones. Some of the blisters were as large as a nickel; some were very small and were thickest on the fat joined to the intestines. I would like to know what was the matter and if the pork is fit to use.

A.—A worm causes such cysts and the meat is fit for use, provided, of course, that it is well salted, smoked and cooked.

Five Wheel Chairs in April

554 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The five April wheel chairs go to Mrs. Keziah Scruggs, McAdams, Miss., 109; John Herman Adams, 703 Grove St., Danville, Va., 105; Elmer Dahlgren, Sect. 34, Munger, Minn., 100; George Edward Sullivan, Shep, Texas, 99; Edna Mabra, Graft, Colo., 96.

Mrs. Keziah Scriggs, age 76, widow the past 30 years and has outlived all her family. Suffers from stomach trouble and rheumatism which has so crippled her that she has not walked since four years past. The COMFORT wheel chair will be a solace in her declining years.

John Herman Adams, age 27, is afflicted with inflammatory rheumatism and has not been able to walk since three years ago. He has no earning capacity and is dependent on his parents for support. He is married and has one child.

Elmer Dahlgren, age 27, has never walked. His legs became paralyzed in infancy and at the age of eighteen had to be amputated at the knees because of blood poisoning resulting from obstructed circulation. He is dependent on his mother for care and support. He writes me that the expected wheel chair will be an "incalculable mercy" to him.

George Edward Sullivan, age 14, has been a helpless cripple since infancy as the result of infantile paralysis which not only deprived him of the use of his legs but of the power of speech also. The wheel chair will be a joy to him and a great help to his mother in caring for him.

Edna Mabra, age six, has suffered from total paralysis of her left side since early infancy. Her father is dead, her mother has married again and the stepfather gives the little crippled girl, her older sister and her mother a good home.

Give the Wheel-Chair Club a boost this month and help get some more of our crippled shut-ins out into the bright spring sunshine and air.

The following letters of thanks and Roll of Honor are interesting.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Very Much Pleased with COMFORT Wheel Chair

Jerome, N. C.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

My wheel chair has arrived and I am very much pleased with it. It is much better than I expected. It is so nice that I can be taken in it to enjoy the fire. I haven't words to express my thanks to you and my friends for it. May the Lord bless you all. Your devoted friend,

Sarah Jane McDuffie.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Help in Caring for Invalid Mother

Water Valley, Miss.

Dear Mr. Gannett:

I wish to thank you and all the other good friends that helped to obtain the wheel chair for my mother (Mrs. Catherine Anne Aven), and especially Mrs. Annie Trusty, Mrs. Groves and Mrs. Emily King who worked so diligently to get it for us. This chair is indeed a comfort to my invalid mother and a great help to me in caring for her. I hope many more invalids will avail themselves of COMFORT'S help to obtain wheel chairs. Truly yours,

Mrs. D. W. Murphree.

She Flattered Herself

A woman who labored under the delusion that men were always on the lookout to speak to unaccompanied females was rather nervous walking along a city street one evening. Two men were just behind her, laughing and chatting in a very queer fashion, she thought.

"May I join you?" she asked of two women walking in front of her.

"Certainly," they replied. The three walked along. Still the two men followed. They were still laughing and making comments which though inaudible the woman felt were directed toward her.

"Thank you for letting me go along with you," she said to her two companions as she left them at a subway entrance. "As a matter of fact those two men walking back of us made me very nervous. I think they have been trying to speak to me."

The women glanced back.

"O, indeed!" replied one, laughing, those men are our husbands!"—Mary Bonner, in Judge.

Polite Polly

A woman was calling at a friend's house. She knocked at the front door, and a voice said:

"Come in."

The woman tried the door, then called: "It's locked."

"Come in," repeated the voice.

"But it's locked!"

"Come in just the same," said the voice. "It's locked, I can't!"

At this point a woman put her head out of a window next door and said:

"There's no one at home. You're talking to the parrot."—Ladies' Home Journal.

The Tale of a Quarter

O happy day! Today I thought
My purse was to the bad,
And then I found a quarter that I didn't know I had.

We'll tell no tale of lesser joy,
Play me no joyous play;
O quarter, quarter, lovely thing!
This is my lucky day!
—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Of course that was a happy day,
The day you found the quarter,
Because with it you found the way
To do just what you orter.

We'll tell no tale of lesser joy,
We'll play no joyous play,
Your joy we know you got, oh, boy,
In a Thrift Stamp that day.
—Portland Express.

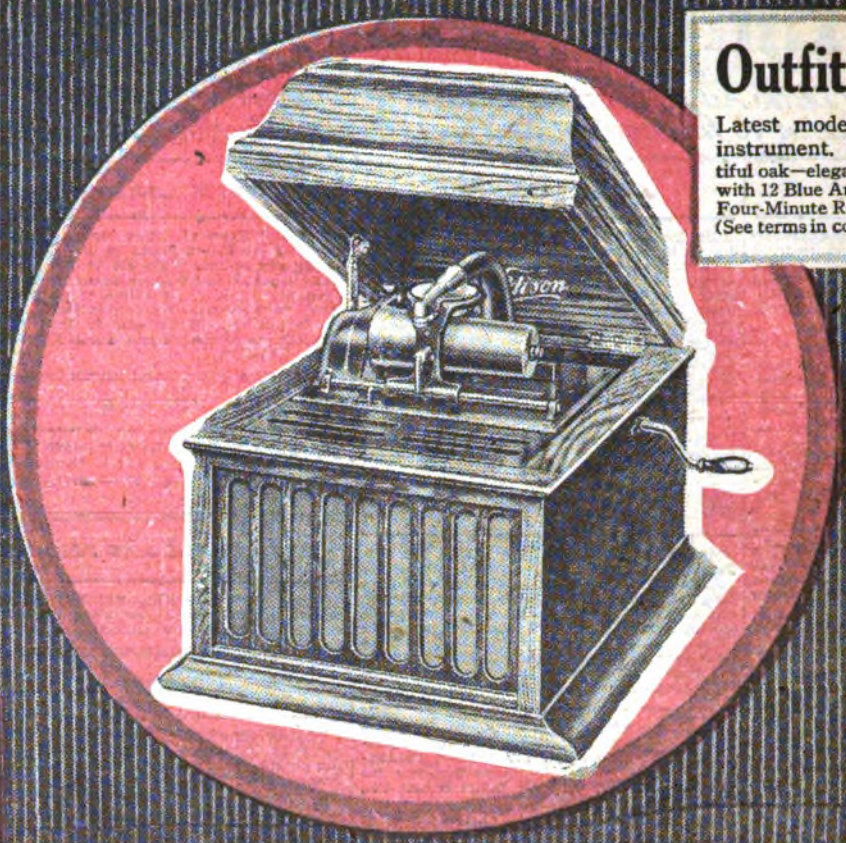
Tenderest Part



"Although I was late," said the new boarder, "I found the landlady had saved for me the tenderest part of the chicken."

"What was that?" asked the old boarder, jealously.

"Some of the gravy."—Pearson's Weekly.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

The Suffering Public Is Organizing for Protection against the Ever Impending Strike Menace

SINCE our May issue went to press developments of a startling nature growing out of the demands of the railroad men for a large wage increase have shocked the public into a realizing sense of the possible horrors involved in the ever impending strike menace, and have started a movement for concerted action among the people at large for relief from the disastrous consequences of a tie-up of the railroads or of other public utilities.

As explained in our May editorial, the one million eight hundred and fifty thousand railroad employees in this country are demanding wage increases that average five hundred and ninety dollars more pay per man and amount to a total yearly wage increase of one billion one hundred million dollars. The railroads as a whole are not earning operating expenses and fixed charges, and it is conceded that the Interstate Commerce Commission must permit them to raise their freight rates and passenger fares in order to save them from bankruptcy and keep them going. Therefore any increase of railroad men's wages must be provided for by a further increase in carrying charges, chiefly by higher freight rates. Higher freight rates mean higher prices and higher cost of living, or in other words that the burden of paying the proposed wage increase would necessarily be passed on from the railroads to the people; and it was on this ground that the railroad managers refused to take the responsibility of granting any considerable wage increase without the approval of the Railroad Labor Board which Congress had authorized for the settlement of railroad wage disputes.

President Wilson has since appointed the nine members of the Railroad Labor Board selected, as required by law, three of them to represent the railroad wage earners, three to represent the railroads, and three to safeguard the rights and interests of the public. The chiefs of the railroad labor organizations reluctantly consented to submit their demand for wage increases to this board, and it was assumed that the entire membership would, as in duty bound, abide by the action of their officers. But a certain unruly member started an unauthorized strike of switchmen, yardmen and trainmen in and about Chicago, which, despite the efforts of the Brotherhood officers and of a large majority of the members to curb it, grew to very troublesome proportions not only there but through the Middle West and to the East as far as New York, for a time nearly paralyzing freight and passenger traffic throughout the large and populous central area of the country. In some localities factories had to suspend operation for want of coal or other material, and even the mails were delayed; freight traffic on some railroads had to be limited to transportation of the necessaries of life and even at that the food supply of New York and some other large cities was endangered. Nor were the agricultural sections exempt from serious inconvenience resulting from the strike.

These strikers were rebellious members of the railroad labor organizations known as the Brotherhoods, and were incited to secede by propaganda in the interest of the I. W. W., the Communists, extreme Socialists, Bolshevists and other radicals bent on overthrowing the Government by force. This strike, which the Brotherhoods were pleased to call an "outlaw strike" because not authorized by but in defiance of their authority, was, as they claimed, instigated by these radicals for the purpose of instituting one great Communist-Labor Union in place of the railroad Brotherhoods and the various other labor unions now affiliated under the American Federation of Labor, and thus prepare the way and provide the instrumentality for a general strike in every line of industry, transportation and other public utility, as a means of reducing the country to a state of famine, misery, anarchy and despair conducive to their plan for a bloody revolution and overthrow of the Government by force.

For this reason the railroad men who remained loyal to their Brotherhood organizations did all in their power to break the strike, and in this they were backed by the Government and by public sentiment most effectively expressed in the form of a legion of volunteer strike-breakers. College students and business and professional men helped run the trains while millionaires even donned firemen's overalls and shoveled coal on the locomotives. The strike was soon broken and most of the strikers have gone back to work—not with their old rating, however, but to start again at the foot of the ladder as new men.

By this experience added to that of the coal strike in which the Kansas mines were kept in successful operation by volunteers the public has learned the lesson of the strike menace and has been aroused to the necessity of preparedness to meet and overcome its evil consequences.

As a rule the rights and interests of the public are but remotely, if at all, concerned in strikes of factory hands or other industrial laborers, and in such controversies between this class of employees and their employers the public has no right to interfere. But strikes which suspend or cripple the operation of public service companies such as steam railroads, street railroads, water, gas, electric light, telephone or telegraph companies, or even of coal mines, and thereby imperil the health or lives of the people, or subject a community to great inconvenience, suffering and financial loss, affect the vital interests of the public. In such case the public is an involuntary third party to the strike and, having rights and interests at stake that are paramount to those of either of the other parties, is justified in taking effective measures to prevent being pulverized between the upper and nether millstones in the strife between labor and capital. All labor disputes that involve the public welfare should be required by law to be decided by arbitration, and strikes that affect public utility service should be prohibited.

Heretofore the "helpless public" has been the goat of such conflicts, and in too many instances this power of torturing the community has been used as a club to force the granting of demands supported by actual or threatened strikes. But at last the patient and long-suffering worm has turned on its tormentors and is manifesting a disposition and power to defend itself. When the Boston police struck last fall the citizens of Massachusetts rallied at the call of Governor Coolidge and patrolled the city until a new, permanent police force was organized, volunteers worked the coal mines of Kansas during the coal strike, as previously stated, and then the Kansas legislature, on Governor Allen's recommendation, enacted a law which forbade such strikes and created a special court with power to decide all wage and industrial disputes between coal miners and their employers. But it is in and around New York that the popular movement to form permanent organizations of volunteers prepared, when called on, to keep trains running and food and other necessaries moving in future industrial crises has made the most progress. And regarding this a New York banker, who did his "bit" as a locomotive fireman during the recent railroad strike, says:

"We are organizing to meet the threats of 'Red' revolution, of the 'one big union,' and of 'industrial chaos' that we hear on all sides.

"Our citizens are enrolling themselves for training as street-car conductors and motormen, as railroad brakemen, switchmen, firemen, and the like.

"Our girls are volunteering to learn how to operate telephone switchboards and to become telegraph operators, and others are ready to learn the work necessary to keep in operation other public service utilities."

Thousands have joined the "Citizens' Protective Union" in response to the appeal of the New York Chamber of Commerce for "volunteers to enroll themselves and take a pledge to remain in readiness to serve in any capacity in an effort to keep the usual methods of travel and communication going, both in transportation of passengers and of food commodities." The "Middle Class Union" was recently incorporated under the laws of the State of New York for the purpose of "organizing the great host of unorganized individuals who are neither labor-unionists, politicians, nor capitalists." Its object is to secure fair play for all classes and to resist class tyranny whether attempted by would-be profiteers on the one hand or by promoters of unreasonable strikes on the other. The activities of the "Middle Class Union" are not to be confined to the limits of New York State but are to be nation-wide, and it is claimed that already it is working to establish branches in thirty-six states. The "Middle Class Union" differs from all other "Unions" in that it does not seek to obtain special advantages for its members. Its slogan is "Fair Play for All," and its members will benefit only to the extent that the community benefits by its efforts. Though strictly non-partizan it is expected to exert a purifying and uplifting influence in politics, as its local branches will naturally become rallying centers for voters to discuss the relative merits of aspirants for political honors and combine for the nomination and election of such candidates as they deem most interested and best qualified to represent the people and serve the interests of the public rather than those of any class.

New Revolution Blazes Up in Mexico

CIVIL war has raged with varying intensity during the past nine years in Mexico and within the last few weeks an extensive and formidable revolt has sprung up against Carranza, the self-constituted President, which bids fair to rid that distracted country of its pestiferous ruler. Few will regret the fall of this usurper whose tyranny has alienated the support of his former followers. A treacherous enemy to the United states and secret ally of the Kaiser, he did his worst to betray our country in the World War. On the overthrow of former President Huerta, in the accomplishment of which our Government was largely instrumental by its persistent hostility and finally through the seizure and occupation of Vera Cruz by our army and navy, Carranza took advantage of the chaotic condition to set himself up as President of Mexico by force of arms. He refused all requests and demands, at that time, to submit to the will of the people to be expressed through an election, and until now has maintained his despotic sway by military power. After years of usurped power the pressure of public opinion finally compelled him to order a presidential election soon to be held. He entered the list of candidates and to make sure that he should be elected he distributed his army in such manner as to intimidate the voters who favored the candidacy of his rivals. Because of this the other presidential candidates have joined forces in the present insurrection which promises to become a successful, speedy and almost bloodless revolution.

Scores of his best officers, after first advising and then demanding his resignation from the presidency, have left Carranza and given their support to the revolution; his soldiers by regiments and divisions have been deserting him and going over to strengthen the forces of his enemies. With such remnant of his army as still persists in following his fortunes he is fleeing before the rapidly advancing revolutionary forces which have already made triumphant entry into the capital city. Good-by to Carranza and good riddance of him, for whoever may be his successor the chances are that the change will be for the better, for the welfare of Mexico and the peace of America.

MY AUNT'S NECKLACE

By T. Rogers Lyons

"AND are you going to sit still and let them get away with it?" The Athenian nose and the Puritanical chin almost came together,—my aunt had a decisive way of speaking.

"But Aunt," I remonstrated, "you have had three detective agencies, and the city police have been more than usually active, and they could find no trace. What would you have me do?"

"I would have you get out and find it."

"Me?"

"Yes, you. You don't seem to have anything to prevent you. If you had any business, or any inclination to attend to business if you had one, you could be excused, but as you do nothing but loaf and wander around anyway, you might at least put in time looking for it. That necklace was worth $50,000 and I don't want to lose it."

"But I am not a detective."

"There are many things you are not. You have a degree but you are not a lawyer. You have a college education but you are not a scholar. You have plenty of money but are not a capitalist or a business man. You have unlimited leisure but you do nothing but waste it. I believe, in spite of appearances, that you have brains, and I would suggest that you give them a little exercise—find that necklace."

It was something over a year since I had returned from college, with the degree spoken of, and as my income was more than ample to cover all my wants, I failed to see just why I should plunge into disinclination at once. My disinclination to go to work at once was the thing that my aunt could not understand; otherwise Mrs. Van and myself were very good friends.

And it was a peculiar situation.

There had been a theater party, given by one of aunt's friends—a very exclusive affair. As was usual on such occasions, the ladies wore considerable jewelry, or jewelry of considerable value. At this time Mrs. Van had worn her diamond necklace part of the time, for sometime during the evening the necklace disappeared. Mrs. Van was positive that she had the jewelry in her possession when the last curtain fell. It further transpired that one of the ladies who occupied the box with my aunt was acquainted with the leading lady, Miss Garcia Empson, and that it was arranged that Miss Empson was to meet Mrs. Payne and go home with her. For that reason, very soon after the final curtain, Miss Empson came into the box before aunt left; in fact, aunt had been introduced to the singer and had spoken with her a few moments. Aunt insisted that it was during these few moments that she lost that necklace. Of course no one believed her; at any rate, when she reached home the necklace was gone, and since that time no one in Mrs. Van's employ, at least, had found any trace of the missing ornament.

And she wanted me to find it. I thought at the time that she was asking an impossibility of me; so I said to her, with the very finest brand of sarcasm that I could command:

"Why surely, Aunt, any one ought to be willing to do so simple a little thing as that, especially if so doing would oblige you in the least."

But alas for my particular brand of sarcasm, I had drawn it too fine, or aunt had not been educated up to it, for she said:

"Well, if you feel that way about it, I'm satisfied; draw on me for expenses, but get that necklace. You always were a good sport, Jim, even if you won't work."

What could I do? Could I rudely shake a confidence of this nature? She really believed that if I would permit myself the necessary ambition, I could succeed where other, and perhaps better, men had failed. It was clearly up to me. But, shades of departed sleuths, how?

That night as I retired to rest I sincerely wished that I might be taken up in the arms of Morpheus and wafted to that celestial region where I might commune a few moments with the late departed Sherlock Holmes. I felt in need of assistance; I was to go to sleep as plain James R. Kirk but I was to rise up a detective—perhaps. Likely not.

Before another day had passed, however, I knew all that any one on our side of the puzzle knew, and that was not much. I learned that it was not likely that Miss Empson was a jewel thief, but that the lady herself was about five feet two, natural blonde hair, plump figure, weight about 125. Several photographs supplied other details too numerous to mention. The one distinguishing mark was that Miss Empson had a small brown mole just under the lobe of her left ear. I was further informed that the Euxine Opera Company had disbanded about two weeks after Mrs. Payne's theater party, and that Miss Empson had departed for parts unknown. The departure was no secret; she had told the detectives candidly that Garcia Empson was a "stage name," but she had so fully satisfied everyone that she was not in any way connected with the matter that they had failed to obtain her real name or learn her destination.

Therefore behold a young man with ample means about to pursue an opera singer—which I am given to understand is sometimes done in real life as well as in fiction. This time an opera singer with a mole in the vicinity of the lobe on the left ear preferred. But why pursue her? Simply because nothing else would satisfy my aunt, and for the better reason that there was not any other shadow of substance to pursue. Of course, it was generally admitted that Miss Empson had nothing whatever to do with it; my aunt, being the minority of one, however, holding a contrary opinion.

She might be anybody. She might be anywhere. It might transpire that she was really Mrs. Smith, and after having had her fling had meekly gone back to Smith and the children and was at that moment peacefully sequestered in a flat in Hoboken, or Kansas City, or Dawson City. Maybe she had gone back to the farm. One lifetime was really too short to even figure out the numerous possibilities, but, relying on the accepted theory that "once an actress always an actress," I figured that I might snoop around among the profession and see what I could pick up.

Having always had a taste for mimicry, I made up, so far as clothes and cravats went, to impersonate an actor, and as such I moved in theatrical circles unchallenged.

Confidently I searched New York, hopefully Chicago, then traveled west, chasing my forlorn hope through Kansas City, Denver, and on to San Francisco. The end of a most promising lead found me in Atlanta, Georgia, all but ready to quit. Many promising leads had been followed, but all ended in nothingness. I had seen blonde actresses, yes thousands of them. Many were about five foot, two, some had small brown moles near their left ears, there were five or six Garcias and one lone Empson, but there was no single one in which were found all the requirements of the description. That description I had learned by heart; I got into the habit of sizing up every woman I met and comparing her with that description. The photographs were constantly in my mind; I could visualize the different poses in the dark. In fact, I was obsessed with visions of the missing singer.

In the course of a walk that I was aimlessly taking one afternoon, I came upon a crowd of people who were jostling each other in a good-natured way to get a view of something that was taking place in a store window—what was it that was attracting all this attention I was never to learn—for there, right in front of me, standing on tiptoe to see over the shoulder of the man in front of her, was—if not an optical illusion—the object of my search. The well-remembered description ran methodically through my mind. Yes, she checked at every point.

"Eureka!"

But now what was I going to do? Obviously, I must keep track of her until I knew her better. Therefore I stepped out of the crowd, waited for her to satisfy her curiosity, then quietly traced her to her abiding place—whether residence or boarding place I did not then know, but a small and very refined sign in one of the windows informed me that there were "Furnished rooms to rent."

From then on it was easy. I had no difficulty in obtaining lodgings at the same address. Then, as of course introductions were in order and James R. Kirk was very much pleased to meet Miss Grace Emerson—did you notice it, Grace Emerson, so near, too near in fact, to be at all doubtful? Grace Emerson of ordinary walks and ways was certainly Garcia Empson of the stage.

Now for the dirty work.

The front porch was long and wide, the weather ideal, comfortable chairs at one end of the otherwise deserted veranda.

"You have always lived in the South, Miss Emerson?"

"Oh, no, Mr. Kirk, I have traveled a great deal."

"For pleasure, I presume?"

"Much of it was for pleasure, as I enjoyed my work, but it was really business, you know. And you?"

"I? Well, I am a bird of passage also, but not on business. My home is in Detroit, Michigan."

"Oh, Detroit! I hear it spoken of as a very pretty city, as well as a decidedly flourishing one, but I have never been there myself."

Thoughts came unbidden; ungallant as it was, I believed the lady lied. It was all so perfect up to that, all the description tallied, the photographs told tales of their own, each separate expression depicted on the print I had seen in the living original, she had traveled, she liked her work—they always call it "work"—the name was similar. The one flaw in the plot was that she had simply heard of Detroit. Suspicious, decidedly suspicious.

During the thinking my talk had continued. I was informed that her head office was in New York, but she was in Atlanta on a short vacation. I pulled the conversation onto theaters.

"You have one privilege in New York that is denied outsiders. You always see the best theatrical and musical comedy productions.

"Oh, yes, I believe that is true, but, personally, I do not care for theatrical performances, they are so unreal and stagy, not a natural thing about them; musical comedy is amusing, some of the plots would drive you wild, but a great deal of the music is really pretty. While it may show a very plebian taste, I prefer the movies; there everything is natural, except when some staged performance is filmed, and then it is worse than the spoken drama."

What do you know about that? If you had been in my place, what would you have thought of that? This lady was certainly some gay deceiver.

More adroit cross-examination and I learned that the lady claimed to be a free-lance illustrator whose work had figured prominently in many publications for the last three years.

There was no use talking; by the way she had that alibi fixed up it was certain that she was the necessary party. If she did not have some guilty knowledge of that necklace, why go to all this trouble to work up so elaborate an alibi? It was too bad, very much too bad, she was such an innocent looking little thing, besides being pretty, intelligent and entertaining. The deeper I got into this the less I relished the situation.

It transpired that her vacation had two weeks yet to run and, as both of us had nothing to do but kill time, it was perfectly natural that we should do this murdering together. And we did. We motored, walked and went to the movies. And such is the inconsistency of man that long before the end of the first week I fervently wished that Aunt Martha's necklace had never existed. Why spoil such a perfectly good time and such interesting possibilities with any old necklace? And, as a matter of fact, what was there to connect this young woman with the necklace? Simply a description that tallied in every point, and seven photos that any one would say were taken from the living model. At all convenient and inconvenient times I probed for further information. For several days, as Aunt Martha's sleuthhound, I attempted to fasten the necklace on her. No, I mean I attempted to prove that she had some knowledge of the necklace. Then gradually by degrees, as realization was forced upon me, I fought like a galley slave to prove that she had nothing to do with it, never heard of it, that it was impossible that she could have ever thought of it. Why, any one had but to look at her and be convinced that she never had anything to do with anybody's valuables. But could I let Grace—I always thought of her as "Grace" after I realized—rest under any cloud whatever? No, not even the cloud of my own amateurish and vague early suspicions. There was not any doubt whatever that I had been barking up the wrong tree. But then, you know, there was the description and the photographs. It was awful.

Early in the second week Grace developed a mania for going to the telegraph office alone. That was suspicious. What did a free-lance illustrator on a vacation want at a telegraph office? I didn't know, but it seemed wrong somehow. Was she communicating with a pal? Oh, Lord, what I suffered! Why must I be harassed with doubts torn with anxiety, and rendered half-crazy by jealousy? Day by day she went; I saw the messages; there were a number of them, and when I saw them one was partly open, worse and more of it, it was in cipher.

And in the stilly watches of that night I firmly vowed that I would renounce forever the role of a detective, would make a clean breast of it, I would endure the suspense no longer, and Aunt Martha—damn Aunt Martha.

But as she walked beside me in the cool clear light of day, how could I tell her? Why it would be sacrilege. I could not bring myself to do it, so I babbled on like the distraught thing I was, using what wits I had left to keep up my end of the conversation.

But the worst was yet to come.

It was Friday, the next to last day of the second week of her vacation, the evening meal had been eaten and the sun was low. We occupied a bench in a park near by. I was glad she was going away tomorrow, yet I could scarcely see how I could bear the separation.

Then the crash came.

"Well, Mr. Kirk, what do you propose to do?"

"Do?" I mumbled as imbecile as possible.

"Yes, do?"

"What do you mean?" with a hope I did not feel.

"Why did you seek my acquaintance?"

"Because I like you." Idiot—I loved her.

"You had no other object?"

"None."

"Lying is a poor trade even for a detective, Mr. Kirk."

I was somehow reminded of Aunt Martha—the way she said that. It snapped.

"Detective.—what makes you think I am a detective?"

"I don't think so. I think you think so."

"You think I was spying on you?"

"I know you were."

"Did you at the same time find a reason for my so doing?" I was feeling better; now that the cat was out of the bag, I would hold my own; I owed that to myself and——

"Not at the same time but since."

"What do you think I was seeking?"

"I know you were looking for information."

"What about?"

"Myself mostly."

"What else."

"Was it an article?" she asked with a suspicion of a smile.

"Was it?" I parried guardedly.

"Was it an article composed of several?"

I nearly fell off the bench so great was my astonishment.

"Name it."

"A diamond necklace, for instance."

Oh, guardian of the demented, look at the spectacle! Down had fallen my house of cards at that moment. Could it be true? Was she going to blast all my hopes and dreams by confessing a theft in that manner?

And she looked at me and laughed—incomprehensible.

"What do you know of a diamond necklace?" I demanded. I was fully aroused and would see this thing through.

"Oh, Mr. Kirk, it's such a comfort to have you ask that question right out. You have suggested it, hinted at it and gone around it every day we have spoken together since you came; it's really refreshing to have you come out and ask it at last."

"Well."

"I know a great deal more about it than you do."

"Candid, I'm sure," I said bitterly.

"Sorry I can't say as much for you," she returned, laughing.

That laugh jarred on me.

"This is no subject for mirth, Gr——Miss Emerson."

"But I find it extremely funny."

"Then is theft amusing?"

"Did I say so?"

"You said you found the subject funny."

"I do, very funny."

"Do you deny the subject is the theft of a necklace?"

"I do?"

"What was it then?"

"The extent of my knowledge—wasn't it?"

"What do you know about it?"

"I to know and you to find out," she replied saucily, mimicking a small child. Ye gods, she enjoyed this but it was rough on Yours Truly. I replied testily:

"But there are means of finding out."

"Some you have not yet tried?"

"Yes, I—that is——"

"What? I'm interested."

"Your partial confession will make you liable to arrest."

"But what if I lied?"

"Your statements, true or false, might be used against you."

"How?"

"You confess that you know about this necklace."

"Yes."

"You were in Detroit on February 27th."

"Guess again."

"Where were you?"

"You would use it against me; I won't tell. But seriously, Mr. Kirk, would you have me arrested on the evidence you have?"

"Have you arrested? Never!"

"But you said that——"

"I said no such thing."

"Well, why not have me arrested?"

"There is the best of reasons."

"What?"

"Well," defiantly, "I love you. I know it won't do any good, and after this you will never even speak to me again, but that does not alter the fact—I love you."

"Yet you suspected me of theft."

"That was before I knew you."

"Yet in spite of appearances you believed in me, part of the time?"

"I can hardly explain it; in one sense I believed in you implicitly, in another I could not explain why it was you so exactly resembled the lady in the seven photographs."

"That is not strange; they were my photographs."

"Your photographs!" I was astonished and dumbfounded.

"Yes, mine."

"How do you know?"

"I know it, as I know other matters that mystify you. But, really, in spite of all appearances you loved me?"

"I did and do."

"In spite of my admission that the photographs you carry are actually mine?"

"Yes, in spite of that."

"But what if I stole the necklace?"

"You didn't," vehemently.

"What would be your feeling if that were true?"

"It would make no difference; that fact would remain."

"You are not serious."

"Never more so. So much that I ask you to marry me today if you can consent to marry an ass or a boob."

"Then you would marry me today and not know any more than you do now?"

"Would I?"

"Well, not today?"

For once I had my wits with me and closed the deal right then and there, for better or for worse. When she got loosed, she asked:

"Are you ready for explanations?"

"Explain if you want to, but as for me I don't care just as long as I have you, and you know the whole thing. I'm content; the thing that has worried me was that you would find out, and now that you have found out I am more than satisfied."

"Logical, aren't you?" she laughed happily.

"No, lovely," I corrected. Silly, wasn't it?

I was really too happy to let her explain much: I was more interested in other things, but after awhile she compelled me to listen by threatening to go in and leave me alone if I didn't listen. I would have listened to a cracked phonograph record rather than have that happen.

Then she told me.

The first day or so she was puzzled; then she began to analyze my system of questioning, and came to the conclusion that I was a detective and that she was wanted for something. Later she surmised that it was a robbery I was interested in. Then I was informed that before taking up art she had done a great deal of stenographic work for her uncle, George Emerson, Chief of Detectives of New York City, and in that capacity had learned his code. She felt that she had needed help and had wired her uncle, who had put the wheels to work with the result that it was but three days before the person who had sung in Detroit on February 27th was safely in custody. Then the rest of the story came out. The "opera singer" had quite a police record. She was really dark haired, and her name was not Garcia Empson, and why she had adopted a disguise patterned after the seven original photographs of Grace Emerson, neither the prisoner, the Chief nor my informant knew, it was just a chance.

I was listening more or less dreamily while she told me about it; then I asked:

"Grace, will you marry me?"

"Well, you seem to be a bad actor, a bum detective, and generally someone ought to take care of you."

And that was as near as this woman would come to saying "yes," but it was just as binding.

"But, Jim, don't you want to know about your Aunt Martha's necklace?"

"Hang Aunt Martha's necklace!"

While I said that impatiently, it was one prayer that was duly answered.

They hung that confounded necklace on my wife's neck the day we were married.

Wedding Superstitions

By Rosalie Barton Cummings

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

PROBABLY nothing in life has so many superstitions grouped around it as a marriage. Many of these ideas are centuries old and some of them go way back to the dawn of history and no one knows their origin. Of course, we do not believe now that certain days, or colors or ways of doing simple things can affect the future or make wedded life either happy or unhappy, but yet we are always interested in what once upon a time people really believed, and some of us are known even today to feel rather worried if the omens are against us.

Here is an old rhyme that shows what happens to the unfortunate bride who selects the wrong color to be married in:

Married in white, you have chosen all right;
Married in gray, you will go far away;
Married in black, you will wish yourself back;
Married in red, you will wish yourself dead;
Married in green, ashamed to be seen;
Married in blue, he will always be true;
Married in pearl, you will live in a whirl;
Married in yellow, ashamed of your fellow;
Married in brown, you will live out of town;
Married in pink, your spirits will sink.

There is another ancient doggerel about the months of the year that are most propitious for the ceremony:

Marry when the year is new,
Always loving, kind and true—
When the February birds do mate,
You may wed, nor dread your fate.
If you marry when March winds blow,
Joy and sorrow both you'll know.
Marry in April when you can,
Joy for maiden and for man;
Marry in the month of May,
You will surely rue the day.
Marry when June roses blow,
Over land and sea you'll go.
They who in July do wed
Must labor always for their bread.
All who wed in August be,
Many a change are sure to see.
Marry in September's shine,
Your living will be rich and fine.
If in October you do marry,
Love will come but riches tarry.
If you wed in bleak November,
Only joy will come, remember.
When December's snows fall fast,
If you marry, love will last.

There are many sayings that have been handed down for years and years. They mostly treat of the unlucky things which might happen:

A man may marry once without a crime,
But cursed is he who weds a second time.
'Tis ill-luck to a bride to see her face in a glass by candlelight.

Change the name and not the letter,
Change for worse and not for better.

Great joy shown in the bride's face presages misfortune.

Married in haste, one may repent at leisure.

Should the wedding ring be dropped during the ceremony, it is a sign of ill-luck, but if a bridegroom carries a miniature horseshoe in his pocket, it leads to good luck in the future.

No telegrams should be given to the bride or bridegroom on the way to church; it is surely a sign of evil.

Kiss a bride directly after a ceremony has taken place, before her husband has an opportunity to do so, and then you will have good luck throughout the year.

If a bride sees a coffin while driving to the station on departure for her wedding tour, she should order the driver to turn back and start over again, or else she will probably meet with bad luck in the future.

When a bride dreams of fairies the night before her marriage, she must consider herself blessed, and if she finds a spider on her wedding-dress it also means a blessing.

The orange blossom, as the flower for the bridal wreath, comes to us from the Spaniards, who got it from the Moors who overran Granada. In ancient history, the "myrtle crowns the happy lover's brow," and in many countries it is still used.

The custom of "shoe-throwing" as an emblem of good luck is accounted for in various ways. Some think that it is a relic of the custom by which the bridegroom was wont to carry off his bride by force amidst the good-humored assaults of her relatives; while others say that as the shoe was in ancient days a sign of authority, the throwing of it is a symbol of the transfer of parental right to the husband.

The Bible mentions this ancient custom of throwing the shoe as an emblem of authority when in the Psalms it says, "Over Edom shall I cast out my shoe."

Rice-throwing was first practiced in the East, and at Parsee weddings the bridegroom has it frequently dashed into his face during the ceremony. Rice is an omen of plenty.

There is even a superstition concerning the best day of the week to be married on, so be careful when you select the "happy day."

Marry Monday for wealth,
Tuesday for health,
Wednesday, the best day of all;
Thursday for crosses,
Friday for losses,
Saturday, no luck at all.

His Heart's Queen

by Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

"I will give up," Violet said in a tone of despair.

Presently a good natured Irish girl looked down upon her.

"You will be very friendly will you not, Wallace?"

It was a telegram, received that very morning.

CHAPTER XXXIII (CONTINUED).

IT was later than usual when Sarah returned to her charge that Tuesday afternoon, after putting her own home to rights, and, being very weary, she thought she would prepare Violet's supper before going up stairs and thus save herself one journey.

"The poor thing has been alone all the afternoon, and I'll get her something nice," she thought; and, ignoring her weariness, she prepared a hot, dainty supper, arranged it temptingly upon a tray, and then mounted the stairs to Violet's room.

Upon reaching it and attempting to unlock the door, she found the key was missing.

She was much surprised at this, for she never removed it from the lock when she left the house, and so she could only account for it by supposing that Mr. Mencke must be inside with his prisoner.

She knocked on the door.

There was no reply and no sound of voices within.

"Miss Violet, are you asleep?" she called, for, seeing no light, she thought perhaps she might have lain down for a nap. Still she could not account for the missing key.

She knocked again, louder, but all was silent, and, becoming very much alarmed, she put her tray down upon the floor, sped through her own room to the other door leading into Violet's, unbolted and threw it wide open, only to find the chamber empty.

With a cry of dismay she rushed to the closet where the girl had kept her hat and ulster.

That was also empty, and the woman grew deadly pale. Then it occurred to her that perhaps Mr. Mencke might have come himself during her absence and taken Violet away.

She tried to console herself with this explanation, until, while moving about the room, her foot came in contact with the pincers, which Violet had left lying upon the floor near the door, and the sight of these explained everything to her.

"Ah, she's a keen one," she muttered, "she made that hole in the water-pipe hoping to get a chance to tell her story to the plumber; but when that failed she stole one of his tools to let herself out with. What will Mr. Mencke say to it, I wonder?"

She was not long left in doubt as to that gentleman's opinion upon the subject, for she soon heard him come in, and hastened down to tell him what had happened.

He was terribly angry, and did not hesitate to make it apparent by giving vent to the most violent oaths. But Sarah was a high-spirited piece of humanity herself, and distinctly gave him to understand that, having been faithful and loyal to his cause, she would not meekly submit to abuse for what she was in no way to blame.

She told him what she suspected, showing him the pincers lying just where Violet had left them, and he was obliged to acknowledge that the girl had outwitted them.

Then they tried to ascertain how she had got out of the house. They imagined that she must have left it by the basement door, since it was the only one that had not been securely fastened, and they found it partially open, and did not once suspect that she had walked away over the top of the house.

Wilhelm Mencke bestirred himself after that, and spent hours that evening trying to get trace of his recent captive; but no one had seen her on the street, neither had the policeman on that beat observed any such person as he described.

After searching in vain in that locality, he took a hack and drove with all possible speed to Fifth Avenue, hoping to learn whether Violet had returned to Mr. Lawrence—he naturally supposed that she would go directly home.

He hung about the house for an hour or two without seeing any one come out or go in; but at last he heard the front door open, and presently two men came out upon the street.

He followed them as closely as he dared, and to his intense satisfaction, he heard one of them remark to the other:

"It is the most mysterious affair imaginable, and Lawrence is nearly worn out with anxiety. He must have grown very fond of the girl; but I don't believe he will ever see her again."

Wilhelm Mencke did not care to hear any more. It was evident that Violet had not yet returned to Fifth Avenue. But she must be somewhere in the city—possibly she was even then on her way down town.

He prowled around Mr. Lawrence's residence until after midnight, and then, feeling sure that she would not come after that hour, he returned, cold and wearied, to his lodging.

He slept late the next morning, and was only aroused when Sarah came to his door saying that she had a letter for him, which had come by the early delivery.

It was the one which his wife had written the previous evening, and having dropped it in the letter-box before the last collection, the first delivery of the morning had brought it to her husband as she had intended it should.

It was brief, but to the point, reading as follows:

"B. M. has just seen the advertisement; she can be found at No. 114 on the same street. V. is with her and has related various matters. Come as soon after receiving this as possible."

The man was amazed as well as overjoyed at this unexpected "luck," as he considered it, for he would not only recapture his bird, but he also felt sure, from the tenor of his wife's communication, that she suspected something of the nature of his plans, and was willing to help him carry them out.

It was very strange, he thought, that she should be almost within a stone's throw of him, while he had been so long seeking her. It was evident, too, that she was not in the most flourishing condition, or she would not be living in that locality; but if he could succeed in carrying out his scheme, they would both soon be living in affluence again.

This scheme was much as Mrs. Mencke suspected—he meant to get possession of Violet's fortune through her, with the intention of skipping for Canada immediately after; taking the young girl with him if she would go, if not, she might go back to the wealthy banker and finally discover her husband if she could.

He made a hasty breakfast, and then set out at once for the number given in the letter, where, as we already know, Violet herself opened the door to give him entrance.

He chuckled audibly, and shook his portly sides with inward laughter at the poor girl's undisguised terror and aversion upon seeing him.

"So, so, my pretty runaway, you thought you had escaped out of the snare of the fowler, did you?" he remarked, with a coarse laugh, as he pushed his way into the room and shut the door after him; then turning to his wife, who was sitting in a rocker before the stove, he said, in an indifferent, off-hand way:

"Well, Belle, old girl, how are you?—a trifle under the weather, I judge, both physically and financially. We have both had rather hard luck during the last year or two, but it looks a little brighter ahead for us now."

Mrs. Mencke replied to his greeting somewhat coldly; then she turned to Violet with something of her old imperiousness.

"Betrayed you, Violet! What do you mean?" she demanded.

"You have violated my confidence," Violet responded, indignantly, "you have deceived me—outraged my feelings and played upon my sympathies only to betray me into the power of the man from whom I have but just escaped. You are an unfeeling and an unnatural sister!"

Mrs. Mencke gave vent to a short, peculiar laugh at this last assertion, while she exchanged a significant glance with her husband.

"Well, perhaps that isn't so strange as it appears, after all, Violet," she retorted sharply, for the girl's words angered her, while she had been nursing her envy of her since she learned of the fortune which had so recently fallen to her. "And," she added, "you may as well know the truth first as last—I am past caring to conceal it any longer—I am no sister at all to you!"

Violet looked both amazed and incredulous at this astounding statement.

"What do you mean?" she faltered.

"This," Mrs. Mencke said excitedly, for since she had resolved to wrong the girl, she did not care how the truth came out; "your father was married twice; his first wife was my mother, and I was the child of a former husband. Mr. Huntington promised to adopt me as his own, however, and did so, giving me his name, directly after his marriage. When I was six years old my mother died. A few months later Mr. Huntington married again, and you were born before the close of the year following; so you perceive that not one drop of kindred blood flows in our veins. Papa did not go to Cincinnati until after your birth, so no one there ever knew that we were not sisters, for we always shared alike even to the property which he left at his death."

"I see, and it explains everything to me," Violet said, looking very grave and pale as Mrs. Mencke paused.

"What does it explain—especially?" the woman demanded.

"A great many things," Violet answered. "First of all, that remark you made, one night at home, and I chanced to overhear, when you said something about a 'secret that must never be breathed.' It explains, too, your lack of sympathy with me, your excessive anger and unreasonableness when I have happened to do anything contrary to your wishes; your determination to separate me from the man I loved, and to make me marry one whom I did not love; and this last piece of treachery and heartlessness, which exceeds all that you have ever done before. You have surely proved beyond a doubt that you are of no kin to me," Violet concluded, with a stinging accent of scorn.

"You are a saucy jade," snapped Wilhelm Mencke, scowling darkly at her. "You do not take into consideration the years of care which Belle has given you, nor the comfortable home which she shared with you so long."

"Yes, I do, for I was grateful until you—both of you—forfeited my affection and respect by your unfeeling and overbearing treatment. And now that I know the truth," the fair girl went on, with curling lips and flashing eyes, "I also took into consideration the fact that, but for my father's generosity, she could not have borne the honored name of Huntington, nor shared in the wealth which otherwise would have been mine alone. I do not forget, either," she concluded, facing the man boldly, "that you have squandered not only her share of that fortune, but mine also."

"And you would not just relish providing me with another to dispose of in the same way?" he sneered, with a disagreeable laugh.

"No, and I do not intend to, either," Violet replied, with undaunted spirit, though she was beginning to tremble and feel weak from the excitement of the interview. "I know all about the recent windfall that I have had; but, Wilhelm Mencke, you shall never have the handling of Jonas Huntington's money."

The man looked astounded at this revelation.

"How did you know anything about Jonas Huntington's money?" he demanded, flushing angrily. "I believe you are a wizard; but, oh! I see!" he added, suddenly; "I dropped that letter in your room—you read it, then slipped it over the door into the hall."

"Yes, I read it; so you perceive I have discovered the secret of your kidnapping me," Violet quietly returned.

"Much good may it do you," he retorted gruffly. "Now I wonder if I can't tell you a secret which you believe to be safely locked within your own breast—Violet, when shall we introduce you to the world as Mrs. Wallace Richardson—wife of the beggarly carpenter, whom you so much admired a couple of years ago?"

A violent shock went through the young girl at the sound of that loved name, and at the knowledge that the secret of her marriage was known to these two, who had proved themselves to be such bitter enemies, when they should have been her best friends.

She tried to reply—to ask how he had found it out, but could not—struggled for breath for a moment, for she seemed to be suffocating, and then fell forward in a dead faint.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

VIOLET MAKES A FLANK MOVEMENT.

Wilhelm Mencke strode forward, lifted the unconscious girl, and laid her upon the bed; then taking a seat near his wife, he remarked, in an indifferent tone:

"She'll do well enough. Let her come to by herself; I want to talk to you."

Mrs. Mencke cast an anxious glance at Violet. Common humanity and her own conscience prompted her to go to her assistance; but her husband, seeing the look, said, peremptorily:

"Sit still! She will come to no harm for a few moments, and I don't want her to hear what I have to say. You know—she has told you about this property that Jonas Huntington has left her?"

"I know that he has left her something," Mrs. Mencke briefly returned.

"'Something!' It is a matter of a hundred thousand or more."

"So much?"

"Yes; and if we manage things shrewdly, we can retrieve our own fortunes by means of it."

"How?"

"I want you to go to Cincinnati and claim this property. The lawyer with whom I have been corresponding is satisfied that you are the next of kin, since everybody believes her"—with a gesture indicating Violet—"to be dead. Of course he doesn't know anything about that early adoption, and it isn't likely that we are going to spoil our prospects by enlightening him. I've been trying to get hold of the money myself; I didn't know whether you were living or dead, and I thought I might as well try for it; but old Middleton knows what he is about, and wrote that there was no chance for me without positive proof of your death."

"Well?" inquired Mrs. Mencke, as he paused.

"Well, as I have said, you must go to Cincinnati at once—tonight, if possible. You will have no difficulty in proving your identity, and the property will immediately be surrendered to you. You will then come back as soon as possible, rejoin me here——"

"And give you the privilege of squandering another fortune for me!" interposed Mrs. Mencke, with bitter sarcasm. "Not if I know it, Wilhelm Mencke. Not one dollar of this money shall you handle! You have wasted enough."

"I have been recklessly lavish, I admit, Belle; but I am ready to turn over a new leaf now," the man returned, with an appearance of sincerity.

"I hope you are," his wife retorted sharply; "but you'll have to begin upon your own account, for you will never get any of Jonas Huntington's money through me."

The man smiled, with an air of superiority.

"We must go shares in this scheme, Belle," he returned, with cool assurance.

"No, sir!" she answered, with cold decision.

"Then you'll get none of it yourself," he retorted.

"How so?" Mrs. Mencke inquired, with a startled look.

"Because if you thwart me, all I've got to do is to take Violet's side—reveal the fact that she lives; then she'll get her own, and you are as badly off as ever," he calmly replied.

"It is a shame that it should all have been left to her," said Mrs. Mencke, sullenly, but evidently impressed that her husband had the best of the argument.

"Well, under the circumstances, I don't know as you have a right to say that," Mr. Mencke replied; "for Jonas Huntington knew, if no one else is aware of the fact, that none of the Huntington blood flows in your veins. Now, if you are sensible, you will do just as I direct; and as soon as you rejoin me here, we will skip for Canada, taking Violet with us, of course, for at present it will not do to let any one know that she is living."

"Do you realize that what you propose is a State prison crime?" demanded Mrs. Mencke.

"I can't help it. I've got to that state of desperation that I am ready for almost anything," Wilhelm Mencke sullenly retorted. "But," he added, "once in Canada, we shall be safe enough. This money will give me a splendid start—I will go into the brewing business—and just as soon as I can turn myself, I will, if possible, restore to Violet all that rightly belongs to her, and then the story of how she happens to be living can come out, for all I care."

The woman bent her head in thought.

His proposition was a strong temptation, for she had been nearly crushed by her recent misfortunes.

All her life, until this last year, she had lived amid luxury, and had been a leader in the best society of Cincinnati, and it had galled her proud spirit beyond expression to drop into obscurity as she had been obliged to do—hiding her head with shame because of her poverty, and the desertion of her husband, although this latter fact had not been known among her former friends.

Now if her husband could have the use of this money for a little while, he might be able to retrieve their fallen fortunes, and then she could resume her former position.

Still, conscience was not utterly dead; she had been fond and proud of Violet, in a certain way, in the old days, and she had never been able to forget how she had wronged her in the past; consequently she shrank from sinking still deeper in the mire of sin and depravity.

But the possibility of a return to her former brilliant life was very alluring, and then Wilhelm promised to do the right thing—it would be only for a little while that she would have to keep on doing wrong—she would be helping her husband to a more prosperous condition also, the end must justify the means, and so, smothering the voice of conscience, she resolved that she would help him to carry out his scheme.

"Will you go, Belle?" her husband asked, interrupting her musings with some impatience.

"Yes."

His face lighted up with a look of triumph.

"Tonight?"

"Yes. But what will you do with her meanwhile?" she asked, glancing at the bed.

"I will take the best of care of her until you return—she shall not escape me again," he answered, in a resolute tone.

"You will not harm her?"

"No, no. I will only see that she does not get away to upset all our plans," he replied.

"All right, then I will go and rest easy. Now that is settled, I must attend to Violet—it will not do to let her lie there unconscious any longer."

She arose and went to the bed, as she spoke, but Violet was already beginning to recover from her swoon.

Mrs. Mencke prepared a stimulating drink for her, and she was soon able to sit up, while she did not appear to be very much the worse for the shock she had sustained, though she was still very pale.

Mrs. Mencke began immediately to make preparations for her departure, although she did not mention her intention in Violet's presence.

The young girl silently watched her every movement.

She well understood what was going on, and though she was secretly very much disheartened by being again thrown into Wilhelm Mencke's power, and the knowledge that his wife was also working against her, she resolved to keep her wits upon the alert, and try to find some way to communicate to the outside world.

Mrs. Mencke finally told her that she was going away for a little while.

"I shall not be gone more than a week, Vio," she remarked, reassuringly, as she saw how very white she had grown, "and you will be kindly cared for during my absence."

"Kindly cared for," Violet repeated, with bitter emphasis.

"Well, you shall be well cared for then," the woman said, flushing. "You shall have plenty to eat, and, if you need clothing, you can help yourself to anything that is here."

"How do you expect all this plotting of yours is to end?" Violet questioned gravely.

"I hope for the benefit of us all," Mrs. Mencke responded, with assumed cheerfulness.

"I think you will find yourself terribly mistaken," Violet returned sternly, "for I warn you that I have borne all that I ever shall from either of you. I shall not tamely submit to such treatment any longer."

"Tamely or otherwise, you shall be obliged to submit for a while longer," Mrs. Mencke retorted

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE days of "kit bags" in which to pack all our troubles to better enable us to "smile, smile, smile," are happily past, and to take its place is a "strong box" that answers the same purpose. We are indebted to a reader for this poem and isn't it a cheery one? If our troubles are ever present and visible, we can't help thinking about them but packed away safely they are more easily forgotten and instead of merely smiling we can laugh. Try it and see.

Then Laugh

"Build for yourself a strong box,
Fashion each part with care;
When it's strong as your hand can make it,
Put all your troubles there;
Hide there all thought of your failures,
And each bitter cup that you quaff;
Lock all your heartaches within it,
Then sit on the lid and laugh.

"Tell no one else its contents,
Never its secrets share;
When you've dropped in your care and worry,
Keep them forever there;
Hide them from sight so completely
That the world will never dream half;
Fasten the strong box securely,
Then sit on the lid and laugh."

LILLINGTON, N. C.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Since reading the sisters' letters in a recent number of COMFORT and thoroughly enjoying them, as usual, I feel that I must knock for admission. Though a new subscriber, COMFORT is by no means new to me as we have kept in touch with it for three generations, grandmother, mother and me.

I would be glad to hear from any of you, epecially the mothers of twins, and will try to answer all letters I receive.

JAMES ROBERT, CHARLES MAYNESS AND MARY PEARL MITCHELL.

I am sending a photograph of our three children which may be of interest to other mothers. Their names are James Robert, Charles Mayness and Mary Pearl. The babies are twins although we do not think they look alike. The boy has always been larger than the girl. The older boy is now six years old and the twins two. This picture was taken a year ago.

Husband and I look with much interest in each COMFORT for the babies' pictures and only wish there was room for more of them.

With many good wishes to all,
Sincerely, MRS. C. P. MITCHELL.

CHAMBERSBURG, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT since a small child and certainly enjoy it, particularly the Sisters' Corner. Most of the sisters seem to have heartaches and troubles to bear. I am wondering how many are as happy as I am. I have a dear little home and a nice young husband. We are living 'way up here in the hills where God's fresh air and sunshine is plentiful.

Mothers, I want to talk to you about your daughters. Do you give them the love and care a daughter should have? Give your girls a chance. Teach them to sew and keep house, and most of all, teach them to cook, and give them as good an education as possible. I've always thought that a girl never has the chance a boy has but it is all the mother's fault if she has not. Some girls are brought up in a quiet home and do not have the opportunity of having pleasure or friends. When they go out among strangers and into the world to make their living they are ignorant of the ways of the world and do not know how to help themselves or how to appear to good advantage. Remember, your daughter is just what you make her. I have one of the dearest mothers.

Dear Mrs. Wilkinson, I am wondering if you ever have any heartaches and sorrows to bear. You never tell us.

Wishing you all good luck, I will close,
Sincerely, MRS. EARL YOUNG.

Bless you, Mrs. Young, almost everyone has heartaches and sorrows and I'm no exception, but mine fade away into almost nothing when I read of others who have greater ones. Thinking about some other person's troubles and trying to help them is a good way to forget your own. May you never have any.—Ed.

GEORGIA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Will you admit a little Georgia cracker to your corner? I'm glad that I'm from the cracker state so don't dare make fun of me. No, I was only joking for I know you are all too considerate to make fun of a newcomer.

I can't tell you how much I enjoy the Sisters' Corner and since the men have been admitted it is more interesting and I am glad Mrs. Wilkinson invited Bachelor Bill and his friends to come as often as they wish. They provide humor and a dash of spice to our corner.

How many of you like to read? I have read everything I could get ever since I was a child and I'm sorry to say that what I read was not always as well selected as it should have been for I was familiar with cheap trashy novels when very young when I should have been reading fairy stories and children's books.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

THE purchase of a whole ham these days might be regarded as an extravagance but to the family of moderate size or the one blessed with company dropping in at unexpected times, it is an economy. Sliced cold for supper or minced for picnic sandwiches, it loses none of its flavor, and it can be kept for some time if paraffin paper is placed over the cut side and the ham hung in a cool place. Select it with care and if very salty soak it twelve or fourteen hours, changing the water several times. Put it on to cook in cold water, with a bouquet of herbs, and let it come to a boil very slowly, letting it cook one half hour for each pound of meat. After it has cooked and cooled, remove the skin, sprinkle the ham with sugar, stick whole cloves into it and put in a warm oven till sugar is dissolved. —Ed.

HAM SOUFFLE.—Make a sauce of two cups of scalded milk, two tablespoons of flour, two tablespoons of butter, one half teaspoon salt, one quarter teaspoon pepper and add one cup of stale bread-crumbs. Cook two minutes; remove from fire and add two cups of cooked ham, chopped fine or run through food chopper, yolks of three eggs, and last of all fold in the well-beaten whites of the eggs. Turn into a buttered baking dish and bake half an hour. Serve immediately.

HAM AND EGGS ON TOAST.—Trim slices of bread into rounds, toast and sprinkle with ground ham. For each slice of toast beat the white of one egg to a stiff froth, adding a little salt. Cover the bread with this, making a little cavity in the center in which place the yolk of an egg; add a little salt and pepper and a small piece of butter and leave in a hot oven until the whites are a delicate brown. Garnish with parsley.

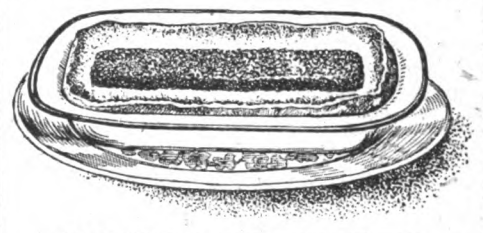
HAM CROQUETTES.—Melt four tablespoons of butter or butter substitute, add five tablespoons of flour and add gradually three quarters of a cup of milk. Cook until thick, stir in two cups of finely minced ham and season. Then add the beaten yolk of an egg and set away to chill. When cold, form into croquettes; dip these in white of egg beaten with three tablespoons of water, roll in crumbs and dip again. Fry in deep, hot fat.

HAM LOAF.—Put three cups of finely minced ham, two small onions and one small apple through meat chopper. Add one tablespoon of prepared mustard and two eggs, slightly beaten. Season and pack into greased bread pan. Cook in moderate oven half an hour. Garnish with slices of cold boiled eggs and serve with salad dressing.—O. M. P., Waterville, Maine.

HAM AND TOMATOES.—Cut cooked ham into thin slices and put them into a buttered baking pan. Sprinkle with a very little chopped onion and pepper. Cover and cook for fifteen minutes in moderate oven. When ready to serve, pour hot tomato sauce over the slices.

HAM AND CHICKEN PIE.—Line deep pie plate with pastry and cover with thin slices of ham to form one layer. Season and cover with slices of cold chicken. Have ready the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, which have been mixed with a tablespoon of flour and a tablespoon of butter and moistened with one cup of chicken stock. Pour this over the ham and chicken and cover with crust. Bake in moderate oven half an hour.—M. E. H., Everett, Mass.

HAM TOAST.—Mince one pound of cooked ham and mix with it two tablespoons of butter, a little pepper and one egg, beaten. Put this into a saucepan and heat until thick. To this add one teaspoon of mustard and mix well. Serve on buttered toast, cut in squares.



HAM TURNOVERS.—Roll pastry thickly and cut into oblong shape. Cut a piece of cooked ham the desired size, sprinkle with pepper, paprika and a little mustard and put a small piece of ham in each piece of pastry. Moisten one edge and pinch together, brushing top with beaten white of egg. Bake in moderate oven.—MRS. A. T., Augusta, Maine.

CABBAGE STUFFED WITH HAM.—Remove the heart from a large head of cabbage. Fill cavity with chopped ham mixed with yolk of egg, seasoned well. Fold the top leaves over and tie cabbage firmly in cloth and boil until cabbage is tender.

HAM SCALLOP.—Mix together two cups cooked chopped ham, one cup of cooked carrots, cut into small pieces, one tablespoon chopped parsley, one tablespoon butter, one cup cooked tomatoes, two tablespoons chopped onions, one cup bread-crumbs and one half teaspoon pepper and one quarter teaspoon mustard. Put in buttered baking dish and cover with buttered bread-crumbs.

LEMON PIE.—Mix one cup of sugar and one and one half rounding tablespoons of flour well together. Add one cup of boiling water and one teaspoon of butter to mixture, which should be in double boiler. In a bowl, heat the yolks of two eggs, and add the juice and grated rind of one lemon. Add this to mixture in boiler, stirring all the time. Cook until thick. Put in baked crust and cover with meringue made of whites of two eggs and sugar. Put in oven to brown.—MRS. GUY COOK, Magnet, Ark.

TOAST WITH SCRAMBLED EGG AND HAM.—First put serving dish where it will be hot when toast is made. Cut bread moderately thick and put in hot oven to dry through and brown. While this is being done, lightly beat three eggs, add three tablespoons of milk, a pinch of salt and pepper. In a saucepan put two level tablespoons of butter, and when it bubbles, add the egg mixture and three tablespoons of chopped cold boiled ham. Cook slowly, keeping it off the bottom of pan with a spoon. It should be creamy when done. Have a dish of boiling water, and taking one slice of toast at a time, turn it around in water to moisten the edges, then wet center by the spoonful, that too much water may not be used. Butter each layer, and spread the egg and ham on top.

DROP COOKIES.—Four and one half cups of flour, two and one half of sugar, one of milk, one of shortening (half butter and lard), three eggs, two teaspoons baking powder, a very little nutmeg, and a few caraway seeds; rub the sugar and shortening to a cream, beat the eggs till very light, and stir thoroughly, after adding the other ingredients; drop on buttered tins, and bake quickly.

SWEET POTATO PIE.—To five well-beaten eggs add one pound of sugar, already rubbed into a pound of butter; mix with two cups of cold sweet potato which has previously been rubbed through a fine sieve; add a teaspoon of lemon juice, beat well and season to taste with nutmeg and cinnamon; add milk enough to make a thick batter and bake in pie tins.

RAISIN PIE.—One pound of seeded raisins and one quart of water. Boil until raisins are soft and sweeten to taste. Mix one cup sifted flour with one cup of cold water and pour into boiling raisins. Cook till it thickens, stirring frequently to prevent burning. This makes three thick or four thin pies.—MRS. FRANK SMITH, Luna, Ohio.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A DEMON'S CUNNING.

THERE was bad blood between Trenwyck and Gorsline because of what happened in the Cutter Street house. It will be recalled that the lawyer had interfered when Gorsline was about to use his knife with murderous resolve. When Neil sprang from Gorsline to unlock the library door and look for Beryl, Trenwyck caught up the knife, which was lying on the floor, feeling quite sure that he would need it to insure his own protection.

After securing the knife, he started for the street, to make his escape from a place where peril was growing more deadly with every passing moment. Gorsline followed him, savage as a tiger. The ruffian had remained behind to look for his knife, not having seen the lawyer when he took it. He remained long enough in the room where the struggle had taken place to hear Neil's agonized call for Beryl; not only that, but Gorsline stole a look through the library door, and saw that the chair in which he had secured the girl was vacant, and that the twisted sheets were lying on the floor.

Trenwyck, flourishing the knife, warned the ruffian to keep off; then turned and rushed into the street, with Gorsline in hot pursuit. For a brief period they stood wrangling in a place of comparative safety, and from there they witnessed Neil's flight alone, with the dynamite blast roaring at his heels. From this it will be seen that Trenwyck, in his later talk with Neil on the following day, had given tongue to more than one falsehood. He had declared—for what purpose of his own it would be useless to question—that he had supposed that Neil had met his fate in the Sutter Street house, only finding out his error when he had talked with Neil's mother; when, as a matter of fact, he and Gorsline knew very well Neil had effected his escape. And Gorsline knew that Beryl had also managed to get away.

The lawyer, plausible and full of guile as ever, insisted that he had interfered to save Neil solely to prevent Gorsline doing something in anger which he would regret in a calmer moment. The latter was far from being satisfied, although he accepted the explanation sullenly and agreed to a truce. His knife was returned, and the precious pair made their way into Portsmouth Square.

While they stood at the edge of the square, debating the present situation and seeking to lay out their future course, an express wagon halted at the curb in front of them, and Berdyne leaped down from his seat beside the driver. Instantly the expressman was besieged by a score of fugitives who wanted his aid. He was not long in making a bargain and in driving away.

The arrival of Berdyne was as sudden as it was unexpected. Had he put in an appearance half an hour earlier, that affair in the Sutter Street house might have turned out entirely different.

"Well, by the eternal!" grunted Gorsline. "Where have you been all this time?"

Berdyne drew close, his keen black eyes searching the faces of his two confederates.

"I've been looking for the girl," said he, in an angry undertone. "If one or both of you had been with us in the Red Flyer, she would not have got away. A live wire struck against the post of the steering wheel; the electricity ran up into my hand and arm, and I was paralyzed for a few moments. That," he added, his eyes glittering with baffled rage, "was the girl's opportunity, and she took advantage of it. Have either of you seen her, or Preston?"

Among the goods and chattels scattered about the square were several piles of office furniture brought from near-by buildings. Among these were desks, chairs, a typewriter-stand, and a typewriter. Berdyne got his eye on one of the chairs, pulled it out, and sat down on it. Gorsline sat on a corner of one of the desks, and, while he recounted the Sutter Street experiences, Trenwyck reclined on the grass and kept wary eyes on him.

"It was a slick game we played," added Gorsline, when he had told all; "and if Trenwyck hadn't stuck in his oar I'd be a three-hundred-dollar 'spark' to the good. As it is," he scowled, "I've not only lost that, but some of my other plunder along with it."

"Trenwyck did exactly right," said Berdyne coolly. "You had no warrant for a murderous assault on Preston."

"I owe him one," gritted the tough, with a look of malignant hate, "and I'll be even with him if I ever git the chance."

"Don't be foolish," said Berdyne sharply. "If the time ever comes when I find it necessary to sweep Preston out of my path, I'll remember you and make the opportunity for you. Have you any idea how the girl managed to give you the slip?"

"No, unless she twisted herself clear of the ropes. I thought I tied her safe enough."

"It looks mysterious to me," muttered Berdyne; "but, on the whole, I'm glad of it. She and Preston are still wide apart, and if I cannot manage to come between them, my brain has lost its cunning. I have been traveling from one point to another all day, looking for the girl; but it's hopeless to try and find anybody in such a confused mob of a place as San Francisco is just now. I hired that expressman for twenty-five dollars an hour, and had started to make a tour of all the squares and parks, looking for the girl. As a result, I find you two, and a pretty story you have to tell me."

Not far from the place where Berdyne sat was a wooden cross over an oblong mound, with smaller crosses over similar mounds to left and right. This was the spot where the bodies from the morgue had been interred. But what claimed Berdyne's attention particularly were written notices pinned to the larger cross with information as to where certain people who had come to the square might be found. This information, of course, was for the benefit of friends and relatives. As he gazed at the scraps of paper fluttering from the upright, an idea entered Berdyne's crafty brain.

"Gorsline," said he, turning abruptly on his confederate, "do you know of any safe retreat in Frisco, or Oakland, where a little business of a shady nature can be safely transacted? We ought to have the place to ourselves, if possible."

Gorsline caught the significant gleam in Berdyne's eyes, and fully understood it. He gave an ugly leer.

"Places of that kind in Frisco have gone up in smoke," said he, "or else they're so close to the fire line that there ain't no dependin' on 'em. They got shook up a little over in Oakland, I hear, but they ain't got no fire to deal with. I know of a place over there—Marm Kinney's. It's a hangout for crooks, but I reckon Marm Kinney hasn't many boarders jest about now, 'bwin' to the rich pickin's to be had this side o' the bay—pervidin' a cove wants to risk a bullet."

"Where is this Marm Kinney's place?"

Gorsline gave the address. Berdyne took a notebook and pencil from his pocket, and wrote for a few moments on his knee.

"Can you use a typewriter, Trenwyck?" he asked, when he had finished writing.

"After a fashion," answered the wondering lawyer.

"Then square around to that machine," said Berdyne, "and make fifteen or twenty copies of this on as many slips of paper."

Berdyne vacated the chair, and Trenwyck sat down in front of him, the leaf of Berdyne's notebook in his hand.

"It's a forlorn hope," said Berdyne, while Trenwyck was reading the written words, "but I've known a forlorn hope to win out more times than once."

"It won't do," said Trenwyck, shaking his head. "I suppose you want one of these posted up in each of the refugee camps, in the hope that the girl will see it?"

"Sharp, ain't you?" sneered Berdyne. "What else do you suppose I want of a thing like that?"

"But suppose Neil Preston sees it?"

"So much the better. I'd like to get him in this net as well as the girl. Then I can make sure he is properly confined while I take my little beauty for a cruise on the Gloriana, which is waiting for us off Sausalito."

"You're clever," muttered Trenwyck, his old cringing deference manifesting itself; "but I think you're too late."

"Too late! What do you mean?"

"The girl, if we can put any reliance in what Preston said during the clash in Sutter Street, is now Mrs. Preston. The law——"

"Hang the law!" snarled Berdyne. "I have sworn to possess that girl; she is the only woman on earth that I can ever care for. Apart from that, there are—well, there are other important matters at stake. If I could find Hargreaves, and get at that trunk of papers, I could explain to your entire satisfaction. Copy that, and be quick about it. Better make about thirty copies; then you can take half of them, and Gorsline the other half, and post them up in every refugee camp you can find."

While Trenwyck, amid all the unusual sounds and commotion that assailed the square, was busily manipulating the keys of the writing machine, Berdyne found a supply of thumbtacks in a drawer of one of the desks.

Gorsline read one of the typed notices, and his evil face filled with guile and cunning.

"What a crook you'd make, Berdyne!" he murmured admiringly. "You've the right touch for a top-liner."

Some time was required by the lawyer to make the copies. There was paper in the desk at which he sat, and the machine itself was in fair condition, considering the rough handling it must have had.

When all was completed, the master scoundrel and his two henchmen separated. Trenwyck and Gorsline were to make a round of the refugee camps, each having a certain number of squares and parks to cover, so that they might not go over the same ground, and in each camp one of the forged notices was to be conspicuously posted. Both men were to keep sharp watch for Hargreaves, and, if found, send him to Marm Kinney's, in Oakland; in addition, the lawyer was to call at Arthur Preston's, on Nob Hill, to learn what he could, if anything, relative to Neil. This duty came in particularly pat with Trenwyck, inasmuch as he was, after a fashion, retained by Morley Preston for certain unscrupulous purposes, and might be said to have the entree of the palatial residence on Nob Hill.

Gorsline went to meet Berdyne at the ferry-house at ten that evening, and go with him to the Oakland rendezvous. Trenwyck was to come later, when his work was finished and the hour propitious.

So the web of deceit was deftly woven. At best it was a forlorn hope, as Berdyne had said, and its success depended on many contingencies; yet, as Berdyne had also pointed out, desperate ventures have often been known to win. And much was to happen between the execution of these plans and that fatal hour when this cunning plotter should cry:

"My plots fall short, like darts which rash hands throw
With an ill aim, and have too far to go;
Nor can I long discoveries prevent:
I deal too much among the innocent!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

CAUGHT IN THE WEB.

When the young officer had called out that Arthur Preston's automobile was coming, and had left Beryl and Tonita and stepped out into the street to meet it, Beryl seized her friend's hand and they hurried off through the park.

"They must not know what we have done!" exclaimed Beryl. "The hateful words spoken by Mrs. Preston last night are still ringing in my ears. I do not want any favors from her! If she allowed herself to feel any gratitude, it could only be false gratitude at best. What I did was all for Neil."

"'Tis well, darling," said Tonita. "I doubt whether that cruel woman is capable of so soft a sentiment as gratitude. Her heart is too hard. How my brain burns with the insulting words she spoke to you! If I were you I should never forget nor forgive them."

Beryl was troubled.

"I think only of my darling Neil's happiness," said she. "Whatever he counseled me to do, I should do."

"That, querida," said Tonita softly, "shows how love can beat down every barrier.

The path they were following led them through the center of the park. At one point the path branched to right and left, and in the very forks of it stood a noble old tree. The tree had been growing there when the park was laid out, and the landscape architect had modified his plans so that it might be preserved. Just at that time the tree was serving a purpose of which no landscape architect had ever dreamed.

All over its trunk, and as high as a tall man could reach, scraps of paper of every conceivable sort, and even bits of cloth and playing cards, were secured, carrying tidings to loved ones.

"Ah!" cried Tonita, halting. "Some one told me of this tree while I was standing in the bread line a short time ago. I made up my mind then to pay it an early visit."

"Let us not stop, dearest," said Beryl, thinking of Arthur Preston, and fearing he should institute inquiries for those who had rescued his aunt. "If the soldiers should be sent to look for us——"

"But do you not understand, dear?" returned Tonita. "People who are looking for friends have posted notices here saying where their lost ones may find them. See, here is one! Listen!" and Tonita read:

"'ANNA BREMER: Mother is waiting for you, dearie. She is in one of the government tents at the west end of the park. Oh, come, come quickly, for my heart is breaking. MOTHER.'"

"That must have been put there by the poor woman who shared our tent with us last night!" exclaimed Beryl, thrilled with the yearning sadness of the poor scrawl.

"Sad, is it not, querida!" whispered Tonita, her eyes dimming. "And, oh, there are so many, many more. They all tell of broken ties, and how many are calling for their loved ones in vain!"

"Do you think that Neil may have left a notice for me?" whispered Beryl.

"Who knows?" answered Tonita. "Let us look, at all events. You take that side of the tree, darling, and I will take this."

"We must hurry," said Beryl, with an apprehensive look behind. "I could not bear to be found and taken into the presence of Mrs. Preston."

"Nor would I have you, dearest. But if any one should come after us we would not have to go. We will not be long, however."

Beryl did not dare allow herself to hope. It seemed, after all her trials and disappointments, as though it would be too much of a favor to ask at the hands of fate.

Later, when something like order began to prevail in the stricken city, the method of finding lost friends and relatives was reduced to a system. Newspapers and others opened registry bureaus, and when the first papers were printed after the disaster, their columns were filled with advertisements all asking for information concerning the missing. But in those first two or three days any method, no matter how primitive, was called into requisition.

Suddenly, while the two girls were pouring over the notices on the tree, Tonita heard a sharp cry from her friend.

"What is it, dear?" she asked, hastening to Beryl's side.

Pale as a lily, her eyes like stars, one hand on her wildly heaving bosom and the other pointing to a typewritten slip on the tree trunk, Beryl was standing like one fascinated, mute from the very excess of joy which ran like fire through her veins.

Yet there was no need of words. Tonita, with a glad cry, read the lying words on the paper and then snatched it from its place.

"At last, at last!" she exclaimed, in a transport of happiness, flinging her arms about her friend. "You see, querida, how Heaven has guided you. If we had not stopped, if I had not felt deep down in my heart that we should not pass without examining every one of these notices, we should have gone on and never known what your sweetheart had left here for you."

"He is in Oakland, after all!" gasped Beryl, her voice throbbing with the rapture of hope fulfilled. "Oh, we must go there at once!"

"Yes, querida," answered Tonita, "without a single moment's delay."

"But we have no money!" exclaimed Beryl, suddenly realizing their abject condition.

Tonita laughed lightly.

"There is no need of money, dearest! Everything is free in San Francisco—even the ferries. But you are rich—rich in the knowledge that you soon will be in the arms of him you love."

So Berdyne's "forlorn hope" reached out toward its pitiful consummation. Poor, hapless Beryl was caught in the web. Yet there were other contingencies which Berdyne's evil plots must meet and overcome.

For the present, however, and, although he did not yet know it, his designs had met with success, Beryl and Tonita, light-hearted as they had not been since that fateful marriage morn which seemed so far, far away, joined the tide of fugitives that flowed in the direction of the Market Street ferry.

This was some little time before Neil with the trembling lawyer at his side, had set his face in the same direction.

CHAPTER XXX.

MARM KINNEY'S.

Berdyne could not have found a place better suited to his wicked purposes than Marm Kinney's. It was a disreputable-looking frame building, far enough in the outskirts to have a solitary situation. There was a pampas plume in the front yard, and back of this a tangle of lilacs and some eucalyptus trees that made an effectual screen for the weather-beaten old dwelling.

It was late at night when Berdyne and Gorsline, catching a stray boat at the ferry, landed at the Oakland mole and pushed on into the squalid purlieu known as J Street. Marm Kinney's house was several blocks from a gaslight. Looking at it from the street, at that hour, nothing could be seen but a blot of trees and shrubbery.

Gorsline was well acquainted with the way, however, and pressed confidently on into the Stygian darkness. Once beyond the leafy screen, a light struck on their eyes from a curtainless window.

Gorsline, with his usual discretion, diverged from the walk to reconnoiter through the window before entering. He tumbled over a heap of bricks—where the earthquake had paid its compliments to Marm Kinney by shaking down her chimney—and got up cursing.

"It's a wonder," growled Gorsline, "that the old rattletrap wasn't shaken down about Marm Kinney's ears. But she was allers lucky. She's there," he added shortly, "but you'd better wait till I go in an' fix things."

Gorsline was about fifteen minutes getting things "fixed." Then he came back to Berdyne, who was smoking impatiently at the front door and congratulating himself on his surroundings.

"It's all rght, Berdyne," called Gorsline. "The old termagant has the place to herself, an' will do what she can to help. Come in!"

Berdyne entered, and his companion led the way to a point where lamplight shone through an open door. There was that indescribable odor of Chinese quarters about the interior of the house—a sickening closeness reeking of sandalwood and opium and stale cigarette smoke. The place would have been better for an airing.

The room into which Berdyne was presently shown was littered with fallen plaster. There was a table and a meager assortment of chairs; a cot covered with a Navaho blanket, near which stood a low table with an opium smoker's materials, an old stove, and an open cupboard showing some cracked dishes. Then there was Marm Kinney.

She was an angular old woman, with straggling gray hair, a beak for a nose, and faded, watery eyes. She sat in a rocking-chair by the table, smoking a cigarette.

Berdyne was pleased. He was a reader of character, and he knew instinctively that, "for ways that are dark and tricks that are vain," the old woman could be relied upon—providing her palm was well crossed.

"Marm's a night bird," chuckled Gorsline. "Here she is, as snug as ye please, waitin' for some dope fiend to come along an' hit the pipe."

"Business is ruined," croaked Marm Kinney, surveying Berdyne furtively through her cigarette smoke. "This here earthquake is a starvin' matter for a whole lot of us respectable people." She leered mawkishly at Berdyne. "I ain't askin' no names, but for a hundred dollars you can

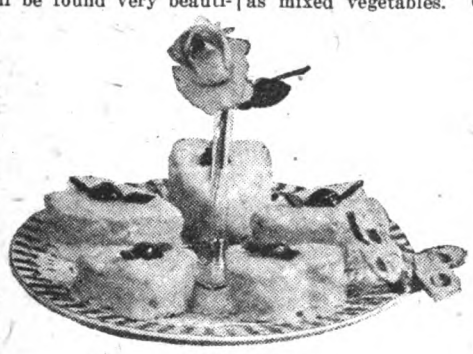
WEDDING REFRESHMENTS

By Violet Marsh

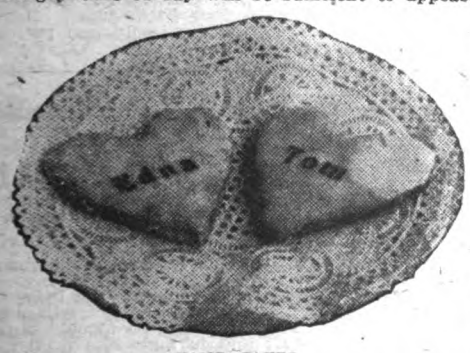


Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

The Bridal Month of June

JUNE, the bloomful month, seems to have been set aside by time-old convention as the month of weddings, probably because all nature is awake and summer days are ahead. There is no time of year when so much appears purely joyful.

We are going to talk about refreshments for the simple home wedding; the kind that does not leave behind a wake of exhaustion, nor an empty purse. The face of an unwearied bride will receive far more compliments than variety of food or arrangements. Tables no longer "groan" under an over-bountiful provision, which was the ideal of elegance among our forefathers. Attempt only what can be easily and well done.



When planning decorations, if a color scheme can be carried out it will be found very beautiful and restful to the eye. It is here that the country dweller has the advantage, for gardens and orchards provide a wealth of material. June roses were used in the accompanying table decorations, though other flowers may be used just as effectively. Unless the wedding cake is used as a centerpiece, it is well to make a definite arrangement of flowers. A round basket filled with wet moss from the woods makes a very workable foundation. The sides can be banked with flowers by extending the stems through into the moss. It can then be built to the desired height by tying wire to the stems before they are set into the moss. The spotless expanse of a "fair, white cloth" far exceeds in loveliness any polished table or doilies for the bride's supper. If her wedding cake forms the centerpiece, at the base lay fine green foliage with here and there a flower, and on top a few stems of flowers and foliage. Here the June rose is exquisite. Garlands of flowers or ribbons of tissue paper knotted to the edge of table with a bunch of flowers add to the festive appearance. Have some talented friend make place cards in the form of wedding bells. The bride and bridegroom will sit together at the head of the table.

FRUIT CUP.—Cut oranges in half and spoon out only the clear pulp. Dice fresh or canned peaches and sprinkle with sugar at once. Dice pineapple, using one of the best brands. Mix together about equal portions of the fruit and add enough of the syrups to make the mixture about one-third juice. Do not add sugar. Fill glasses and top with two halves of walnut meats and two larger pieces of pineapple. Serve cold as first course.

CHICKEN CROQUETTES WITH POTATO CHIPS.—Six pounds of dressed chicken, disjointed and boiled at the simmering point in water enough to barely cover. Remove from liquor and pick the meat clear from bones, gristle and skin. Chop fine. Flavor with a few scrapings of juice from a cut onion, one tablespoon of lemon juice, and pepper and salt to taste. Three teaspoons of celery salt, and three of chopped parsley add much to the flavor. Skim fat from liquor the chickens were cooked in. In a shallow saucepan put five tablespoons of butter, and slowly heat to bubbling point. Smooth in five heaping tablespoons of dry flour. When blended, slowly add three cups of the liquor boiling hot. Stir continuously and cook five minutes. Now add two well-beaten eggs, take from fire, and beat, and mix with chicken. The mixture should be just soft enough to handle when cool. Shape by rolling in the hands. The croquettes should be about one inch through and three inches long. One quarter of boiled rice instead of all chicken may be used, and is preferred by many. Roll in fine bread-crumbs, then in beaten egg, then in crumbs again. Fry in deep smoking fat about one minute. The croquettes can be made the day before, and fried just before serving.

FRENCH FRIED POTATOES.—Pare potatoes, slice thin and soak in very cold water and soak all day, or at least ten hours. One hour before they are to be fried, put them into fresh ice-water. Dry quickly between towels, as they must be crisp when they go into the fat. Cook about one cup at a time for ten minutes. After the first lot, just the right heat can be determined for making them a golden brown. Use deep fat. Sprinkle with salt as they come from the kettle. These can be cooked early, as they are delicious cold. Serve a portion on individual plates with one croquette.

ASPARAGUS SALAD.—Use either fresh or canned asparagus. Drain well. Chop fine an equal amount of cold boiled young carrots and turnips, half the amount of tender celery, and a few radishes. Mix together one teaspoon of salt and one half teaspoon of white pepper, and slowly add five tablespoons of olive oil, then two tablespoons of lemon juice. Carefully dip the asparagus in the dressing. Put a layer of asparagus in a shallow salad bowl, then a layer of mixed vegetables, and repeat until all is used. There should be about three times as much asparagus as mixed vegetables. Over all pour a dressing made as follows: Beat four egg yolks with five tablespoons of sugar until light yellow; add one teaspoon each of salt, pepper and mustard, and a dash of cayenne pepper. Bring to a boil one cup of vinegar and two tablespoons of butter, and beat this into the egg mixture. Use cold.

CHARLOTTE RUSSE.—Soak one half box of gelatine in one cup of cold water twenty minutes. Dissolve in three cups of boiling water. Add two scant cups of sugar and stir until dissolved. When cold, add two full teaspoons of vanilla. When about half stiffened, beat in the whites of six eggs that have previously been beaten to a stiff froth. Mould. When ready to serve, turn onto a glass serving dish, heap with sweetened and flavored whipped cream, and thickly dust with ground walnut meats.

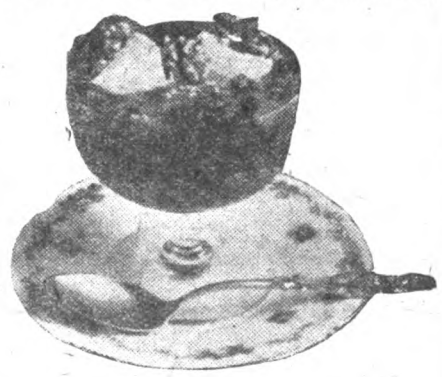
FUDGE.—Two cups of granulated sugar, one half cake of chocolate, one half cup of milk and butter the size of a walnut brought very slowly to a boil. Cook hard about six minutes, stirring continuously, and beat after taking from fire about three minutes, but not long enough for it to commence hardening. Pour into shallow tins and cut into squares when it is partly cool. A good test for time of cooking is to drag the spoon across the bottom of stew-pan, and if the mixture divides so the bottom of pan shows, it is cooked.

CHICKEN SALAD.—Use about one third as much celery as chicken. Boil the chicken and cut into small cubes after removing the bones, skin and gristle. Do not grind as it makes a pasty salad. Use only tender parts of celery cut into small pieces. Both chicken and celery should be very cold. Just before serving, mix dressing with celery and chicken, reserving a little to spread over the top.

DRESSING.—Cream six hard-boiled egg yolks with half a teaspoon each of sugar, mustard, white pepper and three well-beaten eggs. The mixture should be thoroughly incorporated. Measure one pint of heavy cream, five tablespoons of lemon juice, and three of vinegar. Add these alternately to the egg mixture, a little at a time; first cream, then lemon juice and vinegar, beating continually. The egg whites are chopped fine and added lastly.

SANDWICHES.—Spread with butter, slightly warmed, thin slices of white bread and brown bread. After filling two full-sized slices, trim square and cut in two cornerwise.

FILLINGS.—Raisins chopped very fine and mixed with mayonnaise dressing.



One leaf of lettuce and very thin slices of cucumber. Lightly spread with mayonnaise.

Nuts put through the food chopper and mixed with cream cheese. Salt and a dash of cayenne pepper.

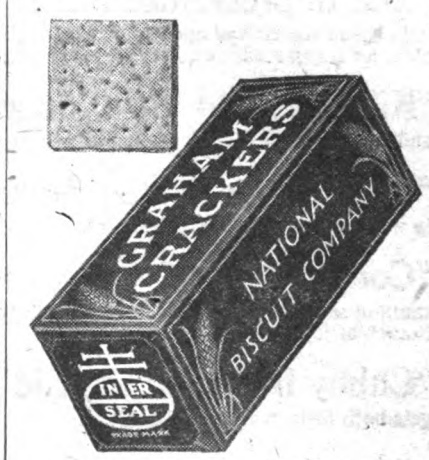
Plain bread and butter, using one slice of brown and one slice of white bread.

MAPLE MOUSSE.—Whip one quart of heavy cream until very thick, taking care it does not turn to butter. It is better to whip it in three parts. If any liquid settles in the bottom of cream after whipping, drain it off. Beat in three cups of heavy maple syrup and a pinch of salt. Pour the mixture into a tightly covered mould or pail, pack in finely chopped ice and salt, using three measures of ice to two of salt. Set to freeze in a cool, dark cellar about five hours. Renew salt and ice if necessary. The ice will keep longer if many thicknesses of newspaper or a large piece of bagging is closely wrapped over top and sides.

SPONGE DROPS.—Beat the yolks of five eggs

FRUIT CUP.

until very light yellow. Beat in one cup of fine granulated sugar, a little at a time. Beat in the grated rind and juice of half a lemon. Add one cup pastry flour and beat hard. Do not use the stirring stroke as it toughens the cake. Fold in the whites of eggs beaten stiff. Bake in moderate oven and dip cakes in boiled icing.



SPICED LEMONADE.—The juice of ten lemons and the grated rind of two, two cups and a half of sugar, four cups of water, six whole cloves, one teaspoon of ground cinnamon, simmered ten

Cubby Bear Calls on Kiddie Goat

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

"WOULD you like to take a walk with me, Chirpy Chipmunk?" asked Cubby Bear one morning.

"Where are you going?"

"To the pasture, to see if Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin are there. You remember Kiddie Goat stayed at my house for a while once when he got hurt. He is a dear little goat, and I have not seen him for a long time."

"Yes, I will go with you," said Chirpy, and the two started happily on their way.

When they reached the edge of the woods, where the pasture began, Cubby Bear was disappointed not to find his friends in sight.

"We will not go home yet," he said. "They may come if we wait a while."

Chirpy Chipmunk soon grew impatient.

"Come to the lower end of the pasture, down over the hill, Cubby Bear," he said, "and see if we cannot find them."

The pasture was empty; not even a horse or a cow was in sight. From the lower end of the pasture, the farmhouse and barn could be seen.

"We must not stay here," said Cubby, "the people at the house might see us."

"I am not afraid," said Chirpy; "they have seen me before. With you, it is different, of course, but I have even gone into the shed, to take crumbs which the children scattered for me."

"How do you dare?" asked Cubby, wide-eyed.

"Oh, look! Look here!" cried Chirpy. "Here is something the children must have dropped!"

"What can it be? Did you ever see anything like it before?" asked Cubby.

"Yes," said Chirpy. "The children spend many hours looking at such things."

It was a picture book, and Cubby Bear, turning the leaves, was amazed and delighted to see colored pictures of performing bears.

"Why, Chirpy, see! Those are bears! tiny, tiny bears! And see the things they are doing!"

"You could learn to do all those tricks," said Chirpy Chipmunk. "Bring it home with you, and practice on them."

"But if the farmhouse children lost it, they will want it again," demurred Cubby. "'Losers, weepers—finders, keepers'!" chanted Chirpy saucily.

"No," said Cubby, as he looked longingly at the bright pictures, "that is not right. You know, yourself, Chirpy that if you lost a thing and I found it, you would want me to give it back to you."

"Oh, well, just as you like. But see, it is beginning to rain, and rain would spoil the pictures. You cannot leave it here, and you cannot take it to the farmhouse. Why not carry it home, learn to do all these tricks, and then, after the rain is over, you can bring it back here where we found it."

"I will do better than that," said Cubby. "I will take it home with me now, and after dark tonight, if the rain has stopped, I will take it to the farmhouse and lay it on the doorstep."

They hurried home, and on the way showed the book to such friends as they met, who, one and all, followed them to Mamma Bruin's house.

"Marvelous! wonderful!" exclaimed Grandma Bear, looking at the pictures through her spectacles. "Old as I am, I have never seen anything like it before!"

"Begin, Cubby Bear!" urged Chirpy Chipmunk. "I am anxious to see you do the tricks those little picture bears are doing."

"The first one," said Grandma Bear, who would not let the book go out of her own paws, "is to stand on your head."

"I can do that!" said Cubby, but found it was not as easy as he thought. At last he did it by going into a corner and leaning against the wall.

"That will do for today," said Chirpy, "but sometime you must learn to do it properly."

"Next is to walk on your front paws," directed Grandma Bear.

Cubby tried, but with little success, while the others clapped their paws and laughed.

"Now get the broom, and balance it on your nose."

At this, Cubby did better, having practiced it before.

"Now you must jump through a big hoop," Grandma Bear told him.

AT THIS CUBBY BEAR DID BETTER, HAVING PRACTICED IT BEFORE.

"But we have no hoop," said Cubby.

"Then jump over a stick. Here—give me the broom—I will hold it up for you."

"Do not hold it too high at first, please," said Cubby Bear.

"Why not let me do the jumping?" suggested Bunny Rabbit.

Grandma Bear looked the book over anxiously. "No," she said, "there are no rabbits here; only bears."

Other tricks followed, and Cubby tried them until he was sore from his many tumbles, and too tired to do any more.

"We have had a fine time," said Redtop Woodpecker, as he was leaving. "We will be glad to see you performing again after you have learned to do it nicely."

"See," said Wollie Woodchuck, "the rain is over, and the clouds are breaking."

That night, Cubby Bear and Chirpy Chipmunk started out to return the book.

Large clouds were sailing along in the sky, blown by a brisk west wind, and the moon, far up above, was sometimes hidden by the clouds, and again, after a cloud had passed, shining out clearly.

They made the journey in safety, placing the picture book on the doorstep while the moon was hidden by a cloud.

"Now that I am so near Kiddie Goat, I do not like to go back home without seeing him," said Cubby.

"Then why not try to?" asked Chirpy. "He must be in the barn; why not call to him?"

"I will," answered Cubby. "Perhaps he could open the door and let me in."

Just then the moon shone out, and they ran behind a shed to hide, but when once more it was clouded over, they went around to the front of the barn, to the big door.

Cubby tapped at the door, calling softly, "Kiddie Goat! Kiddie Goat! are you there?"

"Moo-oo!" called a voice from within.

"That is a cow," said Chirpy. "Call again."

"Kiddie Goat! Lillie Lambkin!" called Cubby.

"Who is there?" asked a timid little voice, which Cubby knew to be Kiddie Goat's.

"It is I, Cubby Bear," he answered. "I wanted to see you once more. Can you come out?"

"No," answered Kiddie, "the door is too heavy for me to move. But perhaps you might manage it. Is anyone with you?"

"Only little Chirpy Chipmunk."

"Then you may try the door. It slides on rollers, and you must push it along—not from this side, but the other. You will have to push hard."

After pushing with all his strength, Cubby opened the great door far enough to squeeze through.

"I am glad to see you," said Kiddie Goat, capering about playfully. "And no one here in the barn ever had evening callers before!"

"But Foxy Reynard told me——" began Cubby.

"Hush!" whispered Kiddie Goat. "I am afraid Foxy has broken into the poultry house once or twice, but he would never dare to come here."

"Are you free to run about over the barn as you like?" asked Chirpy.

"I am kept in a pen over there in the corner," laughed Kiddie Goat. "They do not know I can jump out whenever I choose!"

"Is Lillie Lambkin here?" asked Cubby. "We would like to see her, too."

"She is down in the sheepfold, underneath the barn," said Kiddie.

"Aw-w-w-w! hee-haw! hee-haw! Uh, aw, uh, aw! aw!"

At this terrible sound, long drawn out, rising to a loud shrillness, then growing fainter until it died away in a dismal groan, Chirpy Chipmunk darted out of the open door, and disappeared in the darkness outside. Cubby started to follow.

"It is only the donkey braying," said Kiddie Goat. "He will do no harm. Please do not go yet."

Cubby Bear, who stood by the door, suddenly started back in alarm.

"A man is coming, with a light!" he exclaimed. "Coming to the barn! Oh, Kiddie Goat! what shall I do? Where can I hide?"

"I will show you! Come quickly!" answered Kiddie Goat.

They went into the "tie-up," where the cows looked at Cubby with great, frightened eyes, and pulled wildly at their halters; then through a doorway, and down over a sloping place across which boards were fastened, and which seemed to Cubby Bear like a wooden hill; at the foot of this, Kiddie Goat stopped and said:

"I must run back now and hop into my pen. Go through the basement here, and you will reach the barnyard. It is just a few steps from here. Then you can find your way back to the pasture without trouble. The farmer will be hunting through the barn, so he will not see you. Good by!"

Cubby Bear hurried along through the darkness as best he could, climbed the barnyard fence, went out around the house to avoid going near the open barn door, crossed the road, climbed the pasture fence, then started for the pleasant forest and his own home with a thankful heart.

"I shall take care not to get into such danger again!" he thought, "but I am glad I saw Kiddie Goat. He is such a dear little goat! I wish he might live with Mamma Bruin and me, and be my little brother!"

Queer Signs and Queer Wants

By Carl Schurz Lowden

THE man who set the heading for the article or "story" about the elegant function at the home of Mrs. Overlook made only one mistake, but that was most unfortunate. He intended the double-column heading to herald "Mrs. Overlook's Big Fete," but it gravely announced "Mrs. Overlook's Big Feet."

There is a very real difference. The lady was rightfully indignant, and she told the editor her state of mind. The editor had no trouble in perceiving the wrong; and to make the matter as right as possible under the trying circumstances he thus apologized in the next issue:

"The word we had ought to have used is a French word, pronounced the same way but spelled f-e-t-e. It means a celebration and is considered a very tony word."

Mistakes will creep in where least welcome. The sign-painter has his troubles too. The sign-painter is not always to blame, for often he merely puts down what some one else has ordered. A few samples, conceived with good intentions but ending incongruously, are these:

"Collins Brothers, Undertakers. Ask those we have served."

"All parcels, packages, and grips left and not checked, must be checked or cannot be left in depot."

"Moonlight picnics in this grove every Wednesday night, rain or shine."

"If you see anything you don't want, ask for it."

"Straw hats to fit any face."

"I do repairing of all kinds of shoes in English, German and Hungarian languages."

Signs do not always say what they mean nor always mean what they say. This statement is equally true of want ads, although the incongruities are less frequent now than in former years.

I offer herewith a few ads that failed to express clearly the intended message, but which are interesting on account of the unconscious humor contained in them:

"For Sale—A full blooded cow, giving milk, three tons of hay, a lot of chickens, and several stoves."

"Wanted—A furnished room by an elderly lady with electric lights."

"Unredeemed men's coats for sale cheap."

"Don't go elsewhere to be cheated. Come in here."

"Wanted—A man to take care of horses who can speak German."

"Bathing suits reduced to almost nothing."

"For Sale—Baker's business; good trade; large oven; present owner been in it for seven years; good reasons for leaving."

"Shirts laundered in the rear."

"Wanted—A nice young man to run a pool room out of town."

"For Sale—$5.00 suits. They won't last long."

"For Rent—A room, suitable for a gentleman twelve by fifteen feet."

"Found—A lightweight gentleman's overcoat."

"Bulldog for sale; will eat anything; very fond of children."

"Wanted—Ten girls to sew buttons on the sixth floor."

"Wanted—A boy to deliver oysters that can ride on a bicycle."

HOP up onto my lap while we discuss the following brief note from one of those cowardly Americ-Huns who are so brave and patriotic they dare not sign their names to what they write:

AMERICAN FALLS, IDAHO.

MR. CHARLES NOEL DOUGLAS:

Being good Americans (?) we are tired of your praise of England. Enclosed you will find a clipping which I hope you will read as it will do you good. In the future please give us something American.

I should have paid no attention to the above exhibition of Hun malice if it had not been for the clipping the writer enclosed, and of which more anon. The writer of the above unsigned letter, like all her cowardly class, thinks she can damn a writer and close his mouth eternally if she tags him with the word "England." In her half-baked brain that is as dangerous as calling "mad dog" to some healthy, inoffensive poodle, or shrieking "rape" when a colored man is passing. Most of these hate-crazed fanatics who write these venomous epistles, and who have not been here long enough to get the smell of the steerage out of their clothes, prattle of our gallant forefathers, unmindful of the fact that most of our forefathers were of British blood. Directly they land, however, they nose into one of our old-fashioned, spread-eagle, whip-creation histories, and from these biased, one-sided, hate-perpetuating sources, they get an utterly distorted view of the policies, traditions and relations of the British colonies to the mother country. They are never told that Benjamin Franklin said that "the colonists were so contented that Britain could lead them by a thread." They do not know that the best minds of Britain were on the sides of their cousins the colonists, and have not the decency to understand that it is a crime to make Lloyd George's Britain of today suffer for the sins of a fat-headed old German king who lived a hundred and fifty years ago. If every nation is to be blamed for what its great-great grandfathers did, then go burn your Bibles for the earth can never be anything but hell. The writer does not know that her German George could not get enough Britishers to fight their kin so had to hire Huns from across the Rhine. They do not know that Washington was a British officer in the colonial service and that he wrote in 1776: "When I took command of the army (July, 1775) I abhorred the idea of independence." This was the prevailing sentiment of his countrymen at that time. In "The American Revolution in Our School Books," published by Doran, New York, Charles Altschul writes as follows: "In spite of the controversies which have at times raged between the two peoples, we speak the same language as the English; our customs have been fashioned after theirs; our legal procedure has been founded upon theirs; their ideals of government and their conception of liberty are ours as well. In spite of the wars we have fought against them, we have never thought of turning to any other nation as a model for what is most essential in our public and private life. Many nationalities have been brought together in this melting pot; but the influence of all other nations remains negligible compared to that of England. She is, after all, the Mother Country, from whom we have acquired what really counts in the long run: language, customs, political liberty, traditions."

Personally, I want to be fair and just to all countries for I am striving in the closing years of my life to heal the festering wounds of national contention and so bring all races to that point where they can be made to realize that their interests are not so desperately divergent that the healing balm of humanity, justice, righteousness and good-fellowship cannot draw all together in a workable bond of common unity. Friction there will be, but I do not believe, unless men are wholly degenerate and God has turned his back on the world forever, that continuous, universal bloodshed is necessary, or will be tolerated.

Now as a first step to bringing about this most desirable of all human consummations, it is absolutely necessary, if civilization is to survive to keep the English-speaking peoples (who combined are capable of bringing peace and order to a distracted, chaotic, stricken world) on a friendly footing. Theodore Roosevelt worked for this end, and, with prophetic vision, foresaw and warned us of the propaganda that is now raging in this country against Britain. Britain who for three years while we were leisurely preparing to "do something" and revelling in prosperity, made a living wall of the bodies of her sons against the onrush of the bloodthirsty Hun. As soon as the armistice was signed, out popped the soreheads and the malcontents (who had been a mighty silent bunch during the war) and the whole scheming crowd got together to undo the fruits of victory, to drive a wedge between us and our friends across the ocean, and, if humanly possible, involve us in war with Britain. It is the gutter press, as well as the foreign-language sheets, that have for years grown fat by pouring their venomous hate of the British commonwealth of nations into the credulous minds of those who inhabit our foreign boarding house. It is the same old crowd who was pro-German and anti-American during the war that is engineering this anti-British campaign and terrorizing our vote-seeking lawmakers with their impudent clamor. I shall speak well or ill of any country as circumstances dictate, and no hyphenated alien, masquerading as an American, can muzzle me. Let me warn you genuine Americans that if you permit yourselves to be stampeded by the propaganda that is now raging, all the fearful sacrifices of the war will have gone for nothing and your dead will have died in vain. Let me warn you, too, that if you succeed in wiping Britain from the map, you will discover, when it is too late, that you have been fooled into destroying your friends merely to oblige relentless enemies. Britain, in her endeavor to keep on friendly terms with this country and to work for the uplift of our shattered civilization and the preservation of world peace, has frequently run counter to the wishes of her allies and often antagonized them. Our politicians, caring only for votes, have been ready to make faces at old friends to please the sorehead element of our electorate. These grandstand plays, if directed at Germany in the old days, would have meant instant war. These antics naturally cause international bitterness, delight our enemies within and without, add to the general feeling of unrest and keep a bleeding world from settling down to work and peace.

The writer demands something "American," and then has the nerve to send me an article (to which I previously referred) from one of the many sheets controlled by a gentleman, who, at a public meeting in New York, presided over by the Governor of this great State, was denounced as "the most dangerous man in America." His papers were referred to by Governor Smith as "gutter sheets" and as one of "the greatest causes of unrest in this country!" According to the New York Tribune, at the time the war began these same sheets "published 74 attacks on our allies, 17 instances of defense or praise of Germany, 63 pieces of anti-war propaganda and one deletion of a presidential proclamation." That is the kind of poison that appeals to the anonymous writer of American Falls. COMFORT does not deal in this line of tainted goods. The article forwarded to me by the anonymous patron of the gutter press is the usual bitter tirade against Britain, a country which is just human like ourselves and trying to solve the terrible problems resulting from a war which was forced upon it. Britain, it appears, has built a battleship called the Hood. At the time it was launched it was the most powerful ship afloat, having eight fifteen-inch guns. We, however, have just sent the Maryland into the water with eight sixteen-inch guns, a ship capable of blowing the Hood into smithereens. This ought to quiet the nerves of the gutter press and enable us all to sleep nights. You see, Uncle Sam is more than capable of keeping up with the Joneses! We are told, "with Germany and Russia's navy destroyed that only John Bull could give battle to Uncle Sam." Ain't that terrible!!! It never occurred to the terrified gent who wrote the article that those two navies working together have recently saved civilization and are willing when called on to do it again. It also never occurred to these fomenters of hate that this country has been at peace with Britain for over a hundred years and that to the north there is an invisible boundary line stretching nearly four thousand miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific across which never a gun has been pointed by either Canada or the U. S. In all history you will find no similar instance of such unbounded faith and trust between nations. On the Great Lakes, too, there is not even a war canoe. The New York Globe says: "Britain has never built ships against America and the naval calculations have never contemplated war with America. Britain has maintained the so-called two-power standard with reference to a coalition, including America." Roosevelt in December, 1918, by the way, wrote: "I regard the British navy as the most potent instrumentality for peace in the world. * * * I believe that the time has come that under no circumstances shall there ever be a resort to war between the United States and the British Empire."

The article forwarded to me carefully ignores the fact that when the armistice was signed, three American admirals, Griffin, Taylor and Earl, were sent abroad to consult with the British, French and Italian admiralties in the spring of 1919. In Britain these officers of high rank were invited to inspect the new battleship Hood. That shows you how much Britain is trying to keep us in the dark as to her naval plans. Bear in mind, the British navy has charted the seas and cleaned them of pirates, has policed the oceans and made them safe for travel and commerce. Let us be just even if we do not wish to be generous, and remember Britain has done more to uphold the Monroe Doctrine than we have. George Canning, British Foreign Minister, proposed an alliance with America for the purpose of preventing the Holy Alliance from re-establishing despotism in South America. Monroe took the matter up with Madison and Jefferson and both were heartily in favor of it, but John Quincy Adams talked the matter over with Monroe and came to the conclusion that Britain could be trusted at her own risk and expense, to carry out the policy that America advocated. Another little incident that escaped the notice of the Americ-Huns. Not many years have elapsed since the British in Manila Bay went over to the American side and the blustering German admiral had to pull in his horns and beat it. That action saved us from the menace of a world coalition. The whole United States rang with praise of Britain at that time. She was "our good friend" then, and what has she done that she is not our good friend now? Thomas Jefferson said to Monroe: "* * With her (Britain) on our side we need not fear for the whole world. With her, then, we should most sedulously cherish a cordial friendship and nothing would tend more to knit our affection than to be fighting once more side by side, in the same cause."

The writer asked for something American. I wonder how she will like that? "British naval power has been used time and again," says the historian, Ramsey Muir, "as the last bulwark of freedom against military powers which have threatened to overwhelm the freedom of their neighbors by mere brute strength. That was so in the sixteenth century when Spain seemed to be within an ace of making herself the mistress of the world; it was so a hundred years later when Louis XIV threatened the liberties of Europe; it was so a century later when Napoleon's might overshadowed the world; it was so once more when the German peril menaced the liberty of nations; but the British naval power has never been used to restrict the free movement of all the ships of all nations in times of peace in any of the seas of the world." Right now, Britain is selling a large number of her most powerful battleships, and British estimates and personnel have also been greatly decreased, while we on the other hand are embarking on a naval program which will make us mistress of the seas. So tremendous is that program that even our best friends are getting a little bit worried as to what it all means, for if we keep on friendly terms with our late war associates, we can if necessary send all our fleet to the Pacific where our far-flung possessions need protection and leave the guarding of the Atlantic to our late partners in the war. If, however, we continue to make a cuspidor of Britain and allow our foreign boarders and political demagogues to dictate our policy, she, indeed, would be a fool if she did not take measures to defend herself, for Britain depends on her seaborne commerce for food, life and trade, while we do not. British battleships, however, have no terror for genuine Americans. They only cause excitement to the foe within and the gutter press and the more these elements are excited the better for all decent, peace-loving people.

In the clipping sent we are told that "Britain is building her battleships with money loaned by this country, with the interest due on the gigantic loans to England obtained to use in her war." Her war, mark you. We, of course, had nothing to do with it. Later we are told "that's no reward for saving them from the licking that was coming to them, * * and which a lot of Americans think would have done them good." Note the venom in these statements. The late war was not a war, then, to end war, not a war to avenge the sinking of our ships, the murder of our citizens, the banishing of our commerce from the seas, not a war for democracy. Oh, no! It was just a war to save England and her allies from getting licked. If they had been licked we should have been mourning the loss of a million dead today, and as it transpires that our navy was not prepared, though it had had ample warning and plenty of time to get ready, our coast cities would probably have been in ashes. We loaned Europe ten billion dollars, four billion of that went to Britain, six billion to France, and most of it was spent right here for munitions. Great Britain spent a much larger sum financing the war and her allies and keeping the Hun at bay until we got ready to come in. The Hood is not being built with American loans, for, as I write, millions in gold (not paper) are being sent to this country by Britain and France and half a billion of our loans will be paid back by October. These war associates of ours have suffered frightfully, horribly, and it is these people (people to whom we owed an immense sum in our soup kitchen days when the war broke out), struggling to get back on their feet, mourning their millions of dead, that the gutter press assails and insults. Though we must keep an eye on the foe within, let us remember that we have millions among us of the Pershing breed—Pershing who in the Committee Room of the House of Commons in London voiced "the necessity for closer and firmer union to the end that we may be united as peoples, likewise forever, it seems to me that all discussions of means and ways to prevent war and of plans for the combined nations must be based on a union in thought and in heart, of the Anglo-Saxon people."

General, in the language of the day, "you said a mouthful," a mouthful that our enemies within will not relish. Brothers and sisters, let us with God's help strive to heal the wounds of this tortured world and not wantonly attempt, as many are doing, to make them deeper.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DENVER, COLO.

UNCLE CHARLIE—DEAR SIR: For years I enjoyed reading your chats in the COMFORT magazine, but like the man who wrote to you a few months ago, you do not seem the same old boy, Uncle Charlie, and I am anxious to know why and wherefore the change. I know of only three things that will cause a man to change as you have. First, found he had been advocating a wrong policy (wise men change their policy, fools never do). Second, made enough money and desire to be in the ranks of the rich. Three, a subsidized press. Kindly let me know in your next issue why and wherefore you have changed, and oblige, JOHN SMITH.

Ike Braunstein or Hans Sausagespeil, people of your cowardly type always hide their identity behind some good, honest, American name. I've had about a score of letters from you, Herr Braunspeil, in all of which you took me to task for hitting your beloved Kaiser and Fatherland, Hans, I have never, so far as my knowledge goes, advocated a wrong policy, but in shaping my policies I have to be guided by world conditions, circumstances and events. What you and a lot of other admirers of the twin Czars who rule Russia want me to do is to give a mortal thrust to an agonized world which is already bleeding to death. There are a lot of vermin engaged in this fiendish game, but I don't care to be a sewer rat and eat gilded garbage even out of Trotzky's hand. A sample lot of these reptiles were sent home to Russia. Another bunch of a hundred who were about to be deported, have been turned loose by the Department of Labor to continue their devilish work. Senator King of Utah intends to have this department investigated. It needs it. It was this department that had as Commissioner of Immigration at Ellis Island, New York, a gentleman who was addressed in terms of almost affection and endearment by murderous anarchists, and whose fervent admiration for all things German during the war was a source of exasperation to every patriot. "There is a widespread belief," says the most prominent of New York papers, "that the Department of Labor is a nest of radicals." It is an outrage that the honest word radical should be used in connection with those who sympathize with dangerous Reds. The oppressed and exploited working man of old no longer exists. If he did, I should be at his side giving him all the aid and comfort I could. Organized labor is not only capable of taking care of itself but it has learned all the tricks of the worst capitalist exploiters and is taking care of us—trying, as I write, to starve New York babies by holding up railroad traffic. It is doing and will continue to do with more ferocity as the days pass, the very thing it organized to stop the exploiter from doing. The Reds will see to that. I have no use for profiteers and exploiters, no matter to what class of society they belong. Labor, crazed by agitators, lazy and hysterical will not produce if it can help it, and when it does produce, its product is inferior and the price is extortionate. My remedy for profiteering is the machine gun, the rope and the electric chair, and that medicine should be meted out with exact justice to all, including the man who got ten dollars for doing three dollars' worth of work and the man who got ten thousand for doing fifty dollars' worth. I have learned a great deal during the last quarter of a century. I thought that the exploited toilers were only in search of social justice and a square deal. I find, alas, that too many of them do not want justice, all they want is a chance to get at the savings of the thrifty and industrious, and in a workless world dissipate what others have, by self-denial, hard work and industry, acquired for protection in their old age. I will feed and fondle a sharply as she left the room to go to the attic for the purpose of packing her trunk.

"Wilhelm," Violet said, rising and confronting the man as his wife vanished. "I shall not remain here with you while Belle is away—I will not tolerate your presence for a single hour."

"How are you going to help yourself, Miss Independence?" he demanded, with a leer.

"I will help it," she said spiritedly. "This is not an empty house—there are people down stairs, and I warn you that I shall make such a disturbance as will cause them to make inquiries regarding the occupants of this room."

Mr. Mencke looked alarmed at this threat.

He knew that she could make no end of trouble for him if she set about it, and he wished that he had her back in her old quarters, where Sarah could look after her—the prospect of a week of perpetual vigilance had no charms for him.

"What is the pleasure, then, of your royal highness?" he demanded with an oath.

"If I must stay here, I want you to send Sarah to me," Violet replied.

"Yes, and let you outwit her again," he sneered.

"Sarah was in no way responsible for my escape—she was faithful to you—I could not even bribe her."

"Then you tried that game, did you?" the man interposed.

"Of course I did. I offered her every inducement that I could think of; but she had given her word to you and would not break it. She was kind to me, however, and her presence, although not especially enjoyable, was, at least, not obnoxious to me."

"You are complimentay, my fair sister," Wilhelm Mencke returned, flushing at her implied detestation of him, yet he was pleased to know that Sarah had been true to her trust. "But," he added, fiercely, "I will run no risks with you during the coming week."

"You will send for Sarah or you will take the consequences," Violet reiterated, with a determination which he saw meant mischief.

"Will you go back to the other house and stay with her?"

Violet thought a moment.

"Yes," she said at length.

"Will you promise not to try to attract any attention on the way?"

"No," she answered resolutely. "I shall improve every opportunity to get out of your power. I shall take advantage of the slightest lack of vigilance upon your part."

Wilhelm Mencke started to his feet, his face purple with passion.

"Then, I vow, I'll bind and gag you," he cried, with an oath.

Violet saw that she was going too far—that it would not do for her to be too aggressive. She saw that he was desperate enough to do almost anything to accomplish his purpose, and it would be terrible to be bound hand and foot and gagged.

"What shall I do?" she asked herself.

The letter which she had written to Mr. Lawrence that morning was still in her pocket and unsealed. If she could only manage to add a little to it and get it to him, she knew that he would at once hasten to her relief. But how to accomplish this was more than she could at present plan to do.

While she was considering this perplexing difficulty Mrs. Mencke returned from her visit to the attic.

"You'll have to bring the trunk down for me, Wilhelm," she said; "it is not a large one, but it is too much for me to manage."

"Why do you want to take a trunk?" he demanded gruffly. "The less baggage you hamper yourself with the better it will be for you."

"You don't suppose I am going back to Cincinnati unless I can have some decent clothes to wear, I hope. I intend to stop at the —— House and live in style while I am there, or else I shall not go at all," his wife returned, loftily.

"Who will supply the money for so much style?" he asked.

"You, of course, until I can get what I go after."

He saw that she was determined to have her own way, and with a muttered imprecation upon the vanity of women in general, he started to go up after the trunk.

He turned back, however, upon reaching the first stair.

"Look out for that little cat," he said, scowling at Violet, "she is all ready for a spring, and every claw is sharpened."

"I'll see to her," was the assuring response; then turning to Violet, the woman said crossly: "Why can't you be reasonable? Everything shall be made all right with you, if you will only have patience."

Violet did not reply, but, taking up a book that lay upon the table, pretended to read while Mrs. Mencke continued the preparations for her journey.

The young girl had a pencil in her pocket, and drawing this forth, she managed to write on a fly leaf of the book:

"Am in trouble again. Come at once to a corner house on —— Street; don't know the name of the other street, or the number of the house. South side of street—second story, windows small, with panes of glass; three flower pots on front window sill. VIOLET."

Stealthily tearing this out, she folded it and tucked it into the envelope which inclosed the letter to Mr. Lawrence.

Mr. Mencke meanwhile had come down with the trunk.

"I know what I am going to do," he remarked, as he set it down, while a cruel expression had settled about his mouth. "I am going to take Violet back to the other house. I shall not feel safe a minute with her here."

Violet looked up at him curiously as he said this.

"You think you will have a chance to scare up somebody to rescue you, I suppose," he said, observing the look and chuckling, "but you won't. I'm going to take Belle's Saratoga trunk—it's a small ark—bore some holes in the top, clap you in it, and, when the carriage comes for Belle, take you back to Sarah. I'll just give you a little chloroform first to keep you quiet."

Violet turned sick and faint over this horrible plan.

"You dare not do such a brutal thing!" she cried.

"I dare to do anything to keep you quiet for a week," he fiercely retorted.

"I will give up," Violet said, in a tone of despair. "Send for Sarah, and I promise I will make no disturbance until Belle gets back."

"Honor bright?"

"I have given my word," Violet returned haughtily.

"And you will make no effort to get away?"

"I will not promise you that; if Sarah gives me a chance, whether I am here or there, I shall not neglect it, you may be very sure," she returned, showing her claws again.

"Go for the woman, Wilhelm; Violet will be as safe here as there, if she will keep quiet, and I do not like to leave my rooms alone," Mrs. Mencke here interposed.

Her husband looked undecided for a moment, then he turned and left the room.

Violet breathed more freely the moment the door closed after him; now if she could but get a chance to open the window and throw her letter out to some passer-by, she believed that she would soon be free.

When Mrs. Mencke's back was turned, she stealthily sealed it, and wrote on the outside, "Important—Deliver Immediately," and kept hoping that Belle would have to go upstairs again for something, so that she could send it on its way.

But dinner-time came without the desired opportunity, and after that the hours went slowly by, for Violet was so indignant with her companion that she would not talk, and both were far from feeling comfortable.

At last Mrs. Mencke began to put on her hat and wraps, for she was to leave on the four o'clock express going west, while she was beginning to feel quite anxious for the return of her husband and the woman who was to guard Violet.

"There!" she exclaimed, as she was drawing on her gloves, "I have forgotten some nice handkerchiefs that I wanted to take with me. Violet, won't you go up stairs to my leather trunk, in the room over this, and get a flat box that lies on top of the other things in it? Here are the keys; but you need not try to get out of the skylight, for Wilhelm has nailed it down."

Violet had heard him hammering at something up there, and surmised what he was doing.

"Why don't you go and get them yourself?" Violet asked, thinking she would thus get the desired opportunity to throw her letter from a window.

"Because, for one thing, I cannot trust you here alone, and, for another, I do not wish to soil my skirts by going up and down those dusty stairs," Mrs. Mencke replied.

Violet saw that she would gain nothing by refusing to comply with her request, so she took the keys and slowly ascended the stairs to the attic.

She found the trunk, and had just unlocked it, when she thought she heard a step above her on the roof.

Her heart leaped into her throat with sudden hope, for doubtless some one was there either hanging out or taking in clothes.

She knew that there was a pane of glass broken out of the skylight. Perhaps she could attract the attention of whoever was there, and thus send her letter to Mr. Lawrence.

She stole noiselessly up to the scuttle, thrust her hand through the broken pane, and tapped upon the roof.

The steps ceased for a moment, then they seemed to come toward her, and presently the good-natured face of a young Irish girl looked down upon her.

"Hush!" whispered Violet, at the same time making eager signs for her to keep still.

"Whist, is it?" asked the girl, speaking low. "All right, mavoureen."

"Will you do me a favor, and not let a soul know anything about it, if I will give you a dollar?" Violet asked, in rapid tones.

"Sure, I will, miss, and be mighty glad of the dollar, too," was the eager reply.

Violet hurriedly took the letter from her pocket, and a dollar from her purse, and thrust them through the aperture, whispering:

"Mail this letter for me at once, and don't let anybody see you do it. Here's your dollar, and I will give you five more when I get an answer. What's your name?"

"Jane McCarthy, miss, and I live just next door," said the girl, as she took the letter and money and concealed them in her pocket.

"I will remember," said Violet. "Now go quick—quick!"

She did not wait for a reply, but flew back to the leather trunk, seized the box of handkerchiefs, relocked the trunk, and then went slowly down the stairs, trying to still the rapid beating of her heart, and to appear as if nothing unusual had happened.

"What kept you so long?" Mrs. Mencke demanded suspiciously, when she made her appearance in the room below.

"Was I long?" Violet asked indifferently. "You should oil the lock to that trunk, Belle, and then it would turn more easily."

She picked up her book and sat down as if to read again, but the words danced before her eyes, while she grew so dizzy and faint she feared she would fall from her chair. But she gradually gained control of herself, and Mrs. Mencke did not dream of the flank movement which her victim had made during that brief interval of less than five minutes.

Wilhelm Mencke entered soon after, and he was accompanied by Sarah, and then Mrs. Mencke took her departure, bidding Violet a brief good by without offering her customary caress, for which the young girl was thankful.

Wedding Refreshments

minutes. Allow about one quarter to a glass full of finely chopped ice and water.

SALMON-POTATO SALAD.—Use fresh or canned salmon, and fresh boiled potatoes, which should be drained and dried as soon as they can be pierced through with a fork. Dice both salmon and potato, using about equal quantities of each. Cover with same dressing as used in chicken salad.

SPREAD NUT BREAD.—Sift together three cups of once sifted flour, three teaspoons of baking powder, one tablespoon of sugar, and one teaspoon of salt. Add one cup of milk, two well-beaten eggs, and one cup of finely broken pecan meats. Beat hard, pour into bread tins, let rise twenty minutes, and bake in a moderate oven until it slightly shrinks from sides of pan.

CHEESE RINGS.—Grate two cups of rich cheese. Soak six tablespoons of bread-crumbs with six tablespoons of light cream and four well-beaten eggs. Beat all together with two tablespoons of made mustard, salt to taste and a dash of cayenne pepper. Spread on slices of bread cut into rings with a doughnut cutter, or in squares, and brown quickly in a hot oven.

NAME CAKES.—Cream one cup of butter, add two cups of sugar, two tablespoons of milk and three well-beaten eggs. Beat hard, add four and a half cups of flour sifted with two heaping teaspoons of baking powder, and enough more to roll out. Flavor with vanilla or lemon. Cut heart-shaped, dip in boiled frosting. When the frosting is dry, trace the Christian name of the bride and bridegroom across the cookies with clear melted chocolate.

STRAWBERRIES SERVED ENGLISH STYLE.—Select choice, large, ripe strawberries having a half-inch of stem left on. They must be fresh so that the hulls will not be wilted. Wash, one at a time, by dipping in and out of cold water, and lay carefully to drain. Serve on bread and butter size of plates, with a small mound of sugar to one side, into which each berry is dipped as it is eaten.

The Wedding Cake

Charm and mystery always surround a custom that has long been in vogue, and especially does this apply to the wedding cake which is but the memorial of a practice that, though different in details, shows a striking resemblance in our customs to those of ancient times when a cake of far-and mola salsa was broken over the Roman bride's head. Symbolical of natural plentifulness, whilst the Roman bride gave her right hand to her spouse, she held in her left three wheat-ears, just as the English bride in later centuries bore in her hand a chaplet of bearded spikes of wheat. As far back as 1700 it was the universal custom to drop either whole grains, including rice, or small fragments of thin, dry biscuits upon the bride's head and as it tumbled to the ground was picked up and consumed by the wedding guests. The oatmeal cake was broken over the Scottish bride's head by the best man and first bridesmaid as she crossed the threshold of the first house she entered after the wedding ceremony.

The next step toward the modern wedding cake was the rectangular bun made rich with sugar, eggs, milk, spices, currants and almond paste. Every marriage feast included these cakes, and the invited guests would also bring them in large numbers. Part of these were thrown over the bride's head, and with comical jest the pieces were eaten or preserved as a charm for bringing pleasant dreams.

Long after the adoption of the modern wedding cake, the English mother would often provide two cakes, one to be broken over the bride's head, and the other to be decorated for the feast-table.

WEDDING CAKE.—It will require a full half-day to prepare the fruit, put the cake together and attend to its baking, and it must not be hurried. Wash, seed and chop two pounds of large raisins of best quality. Wash by plunging them into boiling water, letting them remain about eight minutes. Skim out and rinse quickly through a second hot water. Clean two pounds of large currants by covering with flour and rubbing until the grit and tiny stems are removed. This can be done in a colander and by shaking all the flour and grit will pass through. Rinse with warm water until clean. Spread on towels to absorb the water and finish drying in the air. Cover one pounds of almonds with boiling water and let stand until the dark skin can be removed easily. Cover with cold water, rub off the skins and dry between cloths, and chop fine. Cut one pound of citron into slices about one eighth of an inch thick and then into uniform lengths. Measure four cups of flour that has been once sifted, and take enough of this to coat the raisins, currants and almonds. Mix together two cups of sugar, one even teaspoon each of all-spice and nutmeg, two even teaspoons each of mace and cinnamon, and a scant half teaspoon of cloves. Cream one pound of butter until very light, add the sugar mixed with spice and stir thoroughly. Add the well-beaten yolks of eleven large eggs, the whites beaten stiff, the grated rind and juice of one lemon and stir well. Beat in the flour until the mixture is very smooth and then beat in the floured fruit. Have a round pan lined with three thicknesses of paper, with only the top layer thoroughly buttered. Put a thin even layer of dough in the bottom of pan, not more than half an inch deep, and over this an even layer of the citron, repeating these layers until all the dough and citron are used. Bake in a moderate oven three hours. Be sure and have control of the oven before putting the cake in. Too much heat will spoil it.

Wedding cake improves with age, and may be made months in advance. It should be put away in a stone jar wrapped in old white linen. Prevent drying by putting an apple cut in halves into the jar, changing it every two weeks. Ice two days before using.

It is well to remember in any business that the leaks come largely from carelessness.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

But since I have become acquainted with the better class of books I have no desire for the others, and, sisters, when you do not like a good book, read it until you do.

How many of you feel as Mrs. Comstock does about books? "I never see a book but I feel as I do when I stand by the sea on a foggy morning. I can see nothing I know for everything lies hidden in the fog. I wonder what kind of a day lies there and what the day bears. So it is with a book. I open the covers—and the fog slowly melts away."

Let me tell you a habit I have and probably some of you will like to take it up too. In reading any book or magazine I pick out the sentences that appeal to me, or that seem helpful, and write them down in a note book kept for that purpose. My scrap-book, I call it, and it is now full of quotations and poems not only from well-known authors and poets but unknown ones as well. For instance this from "A Weaver of Dreams" by Myrtle Reed. "When all is done the Master Weaver will lead us farther on—we who have been weavers of dreams and have made the most from what we have. If we've put the golden thread into the fabric, and woven the pattern as it was given to us without questioning or repining, we shall not stop here—I'm very sure of that." Is not that a beautiful thought? And this from the same book, "Matrimony. Woman's one great trouble. First, to marry and get something to worry about, then to escape from it and get rid of the worry."

I advise all who have not read "A Weaver of Dreams" to do so for it will surely prove interesting. But to return to my scrap-book, I hope you will give my plan a trial for when you are lonesome and there is absolutely nothing new in the house to read, go to your scrap-book and there you'll find the parts you like best from the works of your favorite authors.

Sincerely, JACK.

Jack.—Mindful of my own starved childhood, so far as good reading matter was concerned, it is a pet dream of mine to establish libraries in remote country places for the benefit of children who are reading the wrong kind of books simply because they haven't the right kind. Not necessarily a special building for the purpose but just books and books—and then some more books. —Ed.

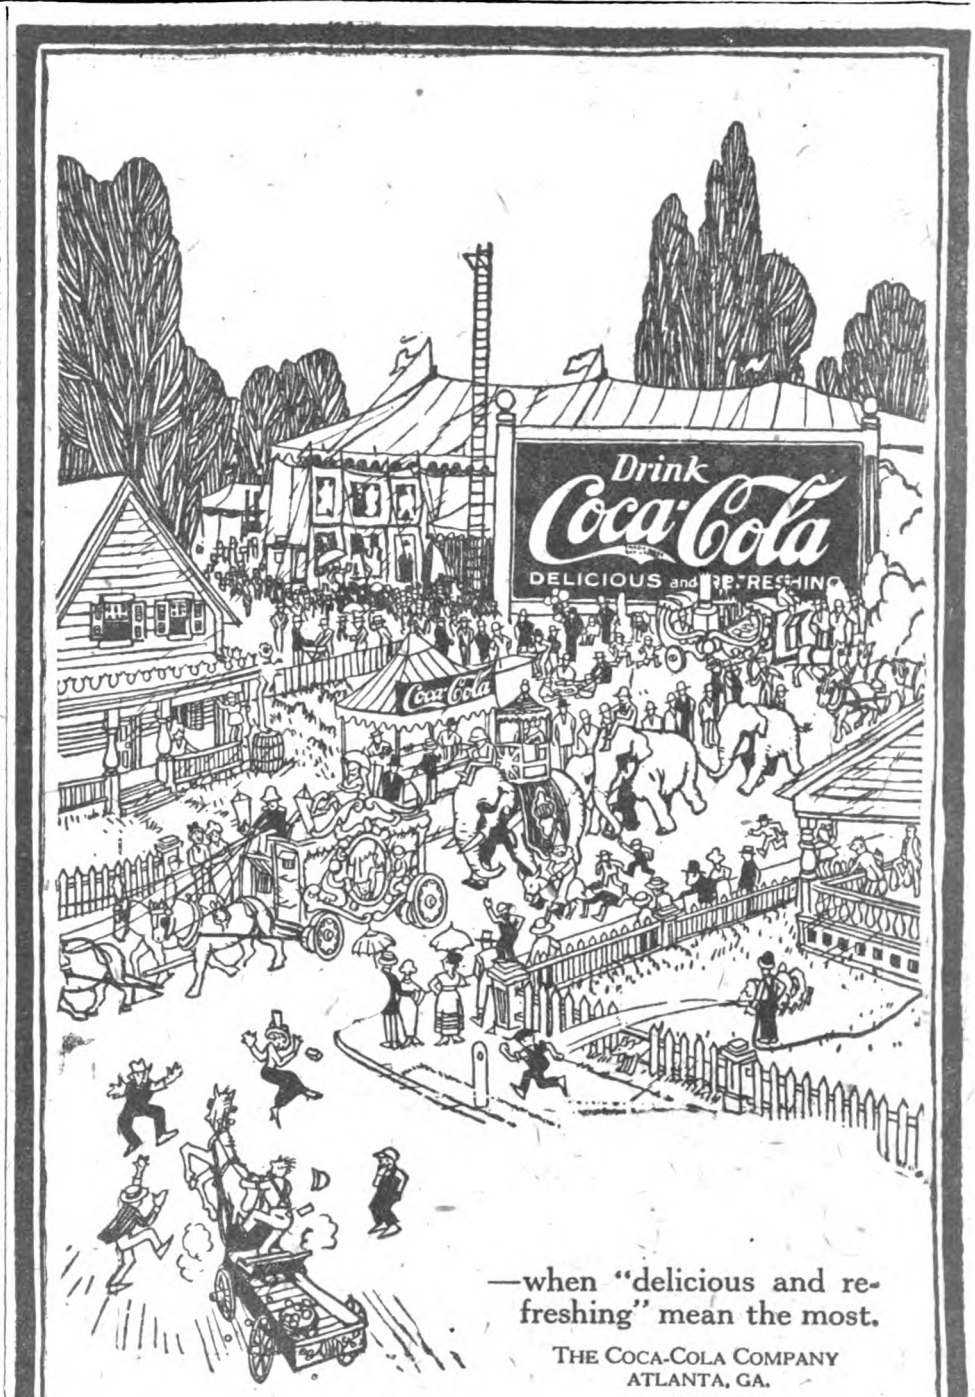
MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please, please do not deny me admittance! Knot Head fairly makes my blood boil and he should not be allowed to run at large! He defends himself, or rather his sex by knocking the opposite. Because women haven't wings (visible to the naked eye), does that fact make "most men" less selfish? It does not! He claims that women as a race are more deceitful and treacherous than men. I claim they are not and I challenge his assertion that the general public are of his opinion. As a race, women are most noble, confiding, affectionate and loyal. Truly, there are some women who are both deceitful and treacherous, and we deplore the fact quite as much as he, but, happily, these women are in a minority by far, especially where serious matters are involved. Take for example, Knot Head, the wildcat speculations and swindles which we read so much about. Are they represented by men or women? I will leave it to your conscience to answer. I fear, in making a study of the race, you have used very poor judgment in selecting your subjects.

You admit "you men are all subject to wrong and do wrong." That's a stumbling block for all of you. You take it for granted, like the measles and mumps in childhood, that men must do wrong because "it has always been done," and so passes comparatively unnoticed. But if a woman oversteps the boundary line—what? Oh! Merciful Horrors! Er-er um-huh! I told you so! And so on to the end of time.

In some instances women find it necessary to take the initiative and you men call it "gall and brass." Now Knot Head, 'fess up! You know you have met women who, apparently, were cold and hard, but if you allowed yourself to become better acquainted with them you would find them really lovable characters but while in contact with the cold, hard world, they find it essential to partially disguise their softer, or as you would call it, their weaker traits. We feel deeply sorry for you, Knot Head, to think you would deliberately entertain such a mistaken idea of our sex when you could so easily be disillusioned. Don't you realize that you are missing the second best part of your life?



Why didn't you tell us the women are vain and conceited? Yes, I know they are, dreadfully so, some of them. Also the men who are equally vain and have an excess amount of conceit. Speaking of vanity, let me just mention that if the men were not so ready to stretch their phrases, which is a mild way of alluding to untrue and deceitful inexactitudes, lots and lots of young girls would be less vain. You see, a great many of these young girls do not know, as you and I do, how deceitful men are and quite naturally believe them, so why shouldn't they be vain? Wouldn't you be vain if some young beauty raved about how handsome you were, how splendidly you danced and how terribly sweet you were with that little curl over your left eyebrow? Poor old Knot Head! I believe you appeared just to see what kind of a hornet's nest you could stir up, but be careful, Sonny, you cannot play with bees without getting stung.

Uncle Charlie is a darling—sometimes. But I think he is as rude as other men at times. He has repeatedly referred to stenographers as "the painted stenographer," as though all stenographers were addicted to the use of paint. One might infer from his comments that there were no respectable girls in their lot. In his reply to Mearle Ashworth, in March, the humble stenographer was too contemptible to be given any notice whatever.

I'm going to champion another of Uncle Charlie's pet aversions and he has a great many backers in this. He fairly despises silk hosiery and georgette waists but let me tell you from experience that they are an economy to the business girl. She leaves the office at five. Allowing her fifteen minutes to reach her boarding house, she has three quarters of an hour till dinner. It takes but a moment to stir up a suds of Lux and warm water. (Notice—Lux Dealers: No charges are made for this advertisement.) Dip the georgette and crepe de chine waists, white satin sport skirt, silk lingerie, hose 'n'everything in the suds a few times, rinse, roll in a Turkish towel and dress for dinner. Half an hour later, by prearrangement with the landlady, iron them. They will have been finished before John's usual time for calling. I have always found that silks wear as well as cotton and they pay for themselves twice over in the saved laundry bill, which is no small item in the weekly expense account. Girls, did you know that your nice voile dresses will appear as new if washed in warm water in which a small bag of bran is placed? The bran acts as both soap and starch, and they are less likely to fade.

Time's up? I'm sorry I've overstayed my limit and I thank you for admitting me. My mind is greatly relieved. Come and see me, won't you?

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I am a reader of COMFORT and have been for a long time. I enjoy reading the views of the different mothers on taking care of children. I, too, am a fond mother, but a sad one. I am going to give you a problem for you to figure out for me and your advice on such.

I have a daughter, sixteen years old. She is such a strange girl that I feel she has not one bit of love for mother. She does not ask for my counsel on any subject whatever. She buys what she wants although she doesn't have very good judgment. If I try to talk to her she will slur me in such a rude way that I have to cry over it. She left school and went to work in a shop. I don't ask her for any money and don't know how much she earns. She gives me $4.00 a week. I don't say much to her for I love her. She is my eldest girl and I have always been so good to her in every way. She never helps with the housework and I do her washing and sewing. She doesn't know how to do housework and would never learn. Now for another important question! Is she old enough to get married? She is very bitter at me because I talk against matrimony for a girl under eighteen or twenty. There is a young man she thinks she loves but I think it is only a childish fancy. She wants to marry him. I wish I could keep her with me a little longer, though she is very cross to the family. Her father is dead. How can I win her love so our little family will be happy? Please print advice as soon as you can?

A. B. B.

A. B. B.—A great many girls who afterward become exemplary daughters have "spells" when they are around sixteen when they think they know ever so much more than their mothers so don't become discouraged. You have been too good to her. If she had to pay her board elsewhere she would find that $4.00 a week wouldn't go far toward board, laundry bills and mending and sewing. What do the sisters think about this?—Ed.

WESTERHEIM, N. DAK.

DEAR SISTERS:

Please move over and let me have a chair. I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for ever and ever so long and have written several letters but guess they weren't worth printing as I have never seen them. Our county doesn't seem to be very well represented so I'm going to try writing again. Perhaps some of you will remember me when I used to live in Minnesota. I heard from lots of the sisters then and several times exchanged flower seeds, scraps of dress goods, etc., with them. For the last eight and one half years I have lived in Golden Valley County, N. Dak., part of the time on a claim and again on rented farms. Our neighbors are far apart and some are not very neighborly anyway. You see, the ranchers feel an injustice has been done them by homesteaders filing on claims which they (the ranchers) used for their stock. But although the homesteaders put up with having the range stock run on them and eat their crops, a good many stayed and would not be run out. Many of us know what it is not to have a bushel of grain when fall came; if not eaten or destroyed by range stock it was destroyed by hail or eaten by cutworms and grasshoppers. But yet we stuck. This is our fourth year without a crop of any kind and if it were not for our cows I don't know what would happen to us. We live at the very extremity of the road where we never see anyone unless they come here purposely. No one ever has occasion to go by. In a way we don't have time to get lonesome as we have a herd of sheep that require attention all the time the year 'round. Please don't think I am complaining of how little we have and then put it down in your minds that the sheep and cattle are ours as we are only working here.

Lately my mother who was staying here with us received a box of fine eating apples that were sent her by a boy she took care of for ten years. He is now a man and out in Washington. She told me to make some into pies. They were delicious. A little while ago my four-year-old asked me if grandma would get some more apples pretty soon. I feel just like starting out and running as fast as I can when I know there are so many places where apples and other fruit lay on the ground wasting and my little flock do not see any fruit unless it is on the Fourth of July or some other similar occasion. Sometimes I would give all the money I ever saw, if I could have all the fruit I could eat. I suppose I ought to be satisfied to live

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

Copying the Rose

JUNE is the month of roses, the most fragrant month of the year, and therefore a good time to answer the question so often put to me by my Pretty Girls—"Shall I use perfume?"

Strong scents are considered in very bad taste, and are offensive to fastidious people, therefore drenching the handkerchief with perfume is something none of us should indulge in.

But there is a great attraction about a very faint elusive fragrance, and there is no reason why the dainty girl should not see that not only her person but her clothes exhale this delicate fragrance. But remember that it must be delicate.

One of the best ways to insure one's lingerie carrying the faintest of fresh sweet fragrance is to line one's dresser drawers—or one's trunk trays when traveling—with perfume pads. To make these, get sheet wadding, cut two layers of this to fit the drawer you want to line; then cut two pieces of pale pink cheese-cloth about an inch larger all around than is the wadding. Sprinkle one sheet of wadding with good sachet powder—mignonette gives a lovely fragrance as does rose, or orris root. Lay the other piece of wadding on top of this, and baste with small stitches all around the edge, so that the powder will not fall out in handling. Now lay one piece of cheese-cloth on the table, and place your wadding pad on it. Turn in the edges of the cheese-cloth to make a hem at least half an inch outside of the edge of the wadding. Place your second piece of cheese-cloth on top of the wadding, after having creased a hem to match the hem on the under piece. Baste the two hems together close to the pad; then slip it in the machine and stitch next the pad and also at the outer edge of the hem. If your hem is not wide enough, and you stitch too close to the pad, the wadding will catch in the machine, so be careful.

Now for the decorative touches. You can tuft your pad with mercerized cotton, just as a comforter is tufted, or you can use tiny buttons to hold the pad and cover together, sewing them at intervals just as you do the tufts. This latter plan is pretty if one lives in a city and can go to a button making company and have tiny flat wooden moulds covered with the pink cheese-cloth, or with scraps of left-over pink ribbon. It costs very little, and is most attractive, though the tufts will do just as well. One can even "quilt" it instead of tufting, using pink thread, and running straight lines in the pad diagonally across the pad, then crossing them with diagonal lines starting from the other side.

Follow this plan and your clothes will always give forth a faint delicate fragrance as you move, while not being open to the charge of bad taste.

A tiny drop of perfume put behind the ears is permissible, and some of the perfumed toilet waters are permissible to sprinkle on the palms of the hands very lightly indeed after bathing. The first strong fragrance immediately vanishes, and leaves behind just a suspicion of lilac or rose, or whatever it may be.

Of course I don't need to say that daily bathing is absolutely essential and that in summertime it should be supplemented by careful bathing of the armpits during the day. One must be perfectly sweet and clean to make the use of scents in any form at all permissible.

Answers to Questions

MISS BLUE EYES.—Brushing the eyebrows with an eyebrow brush stimulates growth. An eyebrow brush is like a baby's toothbrush and you should be able to get it at your drug store. A good way to brush eyebrows is first against the grain—that is toward the nose so that the hair is brushed up on end. This rids them of dust more readily than brushing them away from the nose. It also disposes of any powder that might be left in them after using powder—though you really do not need powder at your age. After the brows have been brushed against the grain, then they should be brushed vigorously away from the nose, shaping them as you do so. Rubbing a little olive oil into the brows at night helps them to grow, but you should wash this out in the morning. There is no way to darken them except to dye them or pencil them, neither of which plans is a good one, especially for a young girl. To reduce your weight you must cut out the fat-building foods and be sure to get plenty of exercise. Working in the garden is good exercise, tennis is fine, swimming, horseback riding, basket-ball, walking. The foods which build fat are the starchy foods—such as Irish potatoes, rice, macaroni, white bread, milk, cream, butter—and the sweets. Quite likely you eat too many sweets—such as candy, cake, pie, etc. These are the things you should cut out, for at your age a girl needs milk, cream, butter and potatoes to keep her well and strong. Don't eat between meals, and be sure to chew your food thoroughly before swallowing. There is no way to remove freckles except by peeling off the skin, because the freckles lie beneath the skin. I shouldn't worry about a few—lots of fashionable women are proud of a freckle or two across their noses, to prove that they have had an outdoor summer. If you are going to be out in the sun, as for instance for a long drive, or playing tennis, you should rub cold cream well into your skin beforehand, wiping off any surplus with a soft cloth. Then powder lightly over this. This protects your skin for a time, and it is permissible for you to use powder for this purpose. Otherwise, for the good of your skin, I should abjure it at your age. The best way to whiten your skin is to eat sensible foods and drink a great deal of water. In summer if you drink much water, the perspiration will carry off the impurities of the body, and your skin will freshen and whiten. A good hot bath daily will open the pores and cleanse the body, but it should be followed by a dash of cool water and a brisk rubbing.

J. P. O.—Whose pictures do I use for this department? Oh, different pretty girls who seem best to illustrate the points I want to make. All of the pictures used in this department are photographs specially posed for COMFORT under my direction. I am glad you liked my March article.

A TEXAS GIRL.—The way to straighten shoulders is to exercise, and also to make up one's mind to stand erect and never to slump down in one's chair. In sitting, let the end of the spine rest back in the seat against the back of the chair, then hold the rest of the spine perfectly straight. In standing, raise the chest and drop the shoulders easily. Do not try to throw the shoulders back, as that gives an ugly line, but let the shoulders alone and elevate the chest—the shoulders will then take care of themselves. Be careful about your corset. Many people who are round shouldered, are so because they have gotten into the habit of "resting" on their corsets. Wear a low-busted corset—see answer to "Alabama Girl"—and keep your spine straight. The fat which you say has collected between the shoulders, is not from stooping, because lots of people are round-shouldered who haven't fat between the shoulders. You need reduction of flesh all over, probably. See my answer to "Miss Blue Eyes" about cutting out sweets. For you, this should probably include rich gravies and fat meats as well. Be sure not to eat fried foods. To reduce your flesh and straighten your shoulders, you will have to exercise—not just once in a while, but ten to fifteen minutes at a time twice a day and every day. It does little good to exercise one day, then skip two, then exercise again the next day or two, and omit for three or four days. Each time it is as if you were just beginning again. The only value of exercise lies in its continuous performance, so that the muscles improve with each practice. A good exercise for you is this:

For Round Shoulders

Standing erect, with heels together, toes out, hands at hips with thumbs back and fingers forward, bend backward at the waist slowly, inhaling as you do so. Count ten. Now slowly bring the body back to the perpendicular, exhaling as you do so while counting ten. Repeat many times. Standing erect, with a book on one's head, while throwing the arms out vigorously at shoulder level, to their full length with fist closed, then bringing them back by bending the elbow and letting the fist thump the shoulder, is also a good exercise for the shoulders. Inhale as you throw the arms out, and exhale as you bring them vigorously back.

SUNSHINE.—Don't wear a high-busted corset with the idea that it will reduce the apparent size of your bust. It does exactly the contrary, as it pushes the bust up so that it is larger around than if it was allowed to flatten itself out over a larger area. You should, however, wear a brassiere of some firm cloth to hold the bust as flat as possible while not elevating it as a corset does. I had some very satisfactory ones made of longcloth and of heavy percale, with armholes like a waist, and buttoning up very tight in front. You may be able to wear the brassieres which you can buy at your drygoods store. Their object is to prevent the bust moving as you move, and to keep it as firm as possible. No, my dear, high heels won't make the legs smaller—quite the contrary. They will also affect your arches and spoil your feet. You can wear what is called a Cuban heel—that is a heel that is somewhat high but is large at the base and straight in line. This supports the foot, where a French heel does not. Never wear a French heel, except for dancing slippers, as you value the beauty of your feet or their comfort. A good leg exercise will help to reduce the calves of the legs. Practice those I have given in COMFORT. Gentle massage with cold cream is about the only thing I can recommend for the scars on your face, though I cannot hold out much hope of their diminishing. Don't use olive oil on the scars. "Is it all right for you to go with the boys?" Well, of course, I am neither your father nor your mother, and, after all, they are the ones who decide what you may do. I should think at seventeen that it would be perfectly all right, and quite desirable, for you to have plenty of friends among both girls and boys, and that you should have the pleasure of going to parties, picnics, etc. I do think you are too young to go on "buggy-rides" with boys, but not too young for things which a lot of boys and girls can all do together. "Should you send invitations to parties?" I should hardly think so. I think it seems more friendly to just speak to this and that boy and girl, and ask them to come to your house at a certain time. However, if it is easier to write just a little note, do so, saying something like this:

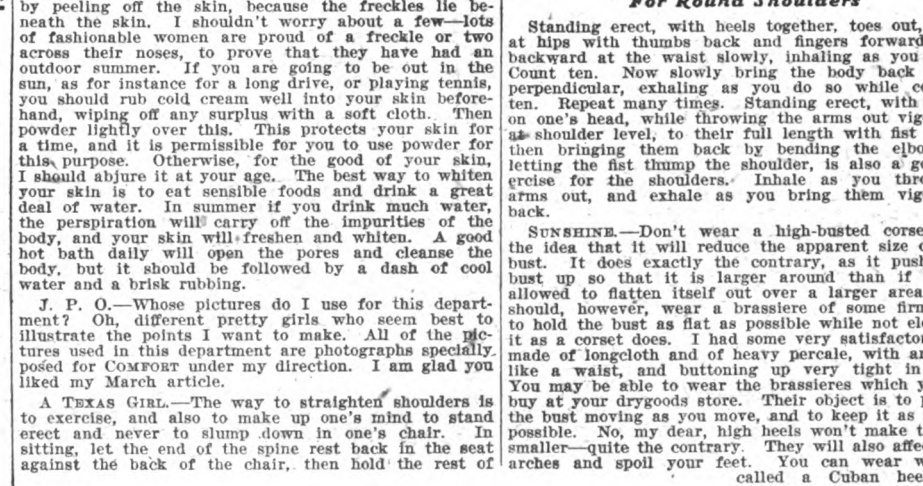
"DEAR POLLY:

"I am asking a few of the boys and girls to spend the evening at my home on Friday, and I want you to be one of them. Do let me know that you will come. Eight o'clock is the hour.

"Yours sincerely, ———"

I answered your letter the very first issue of COMFORT after it came.

TENNESSEE.—I am sorry it is against the rules of this department to answer letters by mail. The only way to darken your eyebrows is to use an eyebrow pencil, but it should be applied very delicately, indeed, as it is not fashionable to have more than a slight thread of eyebrow. If used in this way it should not be "repulsive" nor even noticeable. There is a lotion which is good for darkening hair and might be useful for your eyebrows. I will give you the formula.



To Darken Hair

Two ounces of green tea, two ounces of the last crop of garden sage. Put these in an iron pot—remember, it must be iron— which has a close-fitting cover, and pour over them three quarts of boiling water. It should be allowed to stay on the stove with mild heat under it, so that it will simmer, until it is reduced to about one quart of liquid. Remove from the fire, let stand in the iron pot for twenty-four hours, then strain and place in a bottle. At night apply to the eyebrows, and also massage the line of the eyebrows with the finger-tips for at least ten minutes night and morning.

TURN HAIR DARK WITH SAGE TEA

If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody Can Tell.

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome. Nowadays, by asking at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," you will get a large bottle of this famous old recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, at a small cost.

Don't stay gray! Try it! No one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy and attractive.

Young Mrs. Gains Seeks Advice

By Myrtle Mauldin

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

EACH day when David Gains returned from the office he paused at his own front gate to refresh his eyes with the scene before him.

The June sun was rapidly perfecting the work which April showers had begun in the luscious garden. Roses bloomed in riotous profusion against the wide veranda. The well-kept lawn and stately shade trees gave a dignity to the white bungalow set in their midst that greatly pleased David. For this was his first home—the perfect visualization of his dream of happiness and beauty. And within that small house waited his wife, the bride he had brought to it only one short month ago.

David's parents died when he was too young to remember them, but he had planned for a home as far back as he could recollect. All his time and energy he had devoted to this one purpose, so he had lived a singularly lonely life. By working early and late he had established himself among the successful men of his profession. There had been no time to make intimate friends or participate in social affairs. No spectacular successes had rewarded his efforts, but he was on solid ground; every year saw him considerably nearer the high goal he had set for himself.

Then at twenty-nine he had met Neva Redmond. The easy, care-free life she led, her beautiful home, loving parents, and devoted friends—all the advantages he had longed for but lacked—were constant sources of delight to the lonely man. While David's cool courage, unfailing self-reliance and assured business ability were equally attractive to Neva. Added to these qualities, Neva possessed beauty of the radiant, sparkling kind and David was decidedly distinguished in appearance. After a brief friendship followed by a supremely happy courtship they were married.

As he now recalled the perfect happiness of the past month, something that was very like a prayer of gratitude rose to David's lips. He waited at the gate a moment, then walked briskly up the path, his eager, expectant eyes on the house. The door flew open just as he mounted the steps and Neva, smiling and blushing at the warm adoration in her husband's eyes, came forth to greet him.

When they had finished supper and were back in the living-room he gently caught her in his arms and drew her down into the big chair with him.

"I want to talk to you about a little business, dear," he said. The lamps were not yet lighted, but in the soft still dusk of twilight David saw the look of surprise that widened Neva's brown eyes.

"You know, dear, that I am not a rich man; I'm still struggling. Some day I hope to be able to give you everything you want regardless of cost. But for the present we must keep our expenses within my income and leave a margin for profit if I am to make any progress. Without your loyal support I cannot hope to carry out my plans for the future. Anything you need it is all right to buy, of course, but surely, dear, you did not need all these things." He took a little stack of bills from his pocket and laid them on the table.

Neva sprang up and faced him, a hard light in her eyes.

"Are you trying to tell me that I am not to buy things and have the bills sent to you?" she asked icily.

"Good heavens, no; of course not! Anything you need, anything you want within reason——"

"Because if you are I'll go back home right now."

"Oh, Neva, my darling, how can you think——" David's voice choked with incredulous horror. She had snapped on the lights, revealing a face red with anger.

"I was told you were that kind," the scornful young voice went on. "The stingy sort of a man that wants his wife to dress on nothing and stay at home all the time——"

"Neva!"

"But I tell you I won't have that sort of husband. I am not used to being treated like a child. I won't stand it."

She sank upon a chair and began to cry.

When her sobs subsided sufficiently for him to be heard, David talked to her patiently, gently, explaining his position in detail.

"Now, darling," he concluded, "let's forget this unpleasant episode and never let it occur again. Really it is a great ado about nothing."

He sat down upon the arm of her chair and attempted to remove her hands from her face, but she sprang to her feet with a gesture of fury.

"Do not touch me," she cried. "I wish I had never married you."

She rushed out of the room and a moment later David heard the key turn in her bedroom door. He picked up his hat and went down town.

This was only the first of many quarrels between Neva and David that summer. There was always a reconciliation followed by a few days of calm, when another petty misunderstanding would come up. Each quarrel paved the way for the next, which was invariably stormier than the last. They indulged in harsh words that rankled in the memory of each until their whole lives were embittered.

A picture of his wife's face, distorted with anger, limned itself indelibly upon David's mind. Her unjust, sarcastic words never lost their power to cut his heart like a knife-thrust. While Neva fiercely resented his increasing coldness and curt impersonal manner. Her face assumed a petulant look like that of a spoiled child, wholly unlike her former cheerful expression. David's shoulders drooped like those of an old man; his eyes were no longer bright and hopeful. He tried to shake off the domestic nightmare and give all his time and thought to his business. But he found this impossible; Neva became jealous of the devotion he lavished upon his work.

One evening after supper she suggested that they go to a show.

"Sorry, dear," he replied regretfully, "but I promised Smith I would come over there to talk over a business matter tonight. It is important. It means the making or losing of several hundred dollars for me, and I cannot afford to risk losing, much as I would like to go with you." He talked rapidly, hoping to stay the flood of color that was dyeing her pretty face.

"Go ahead then, I do not care," she stormed. "I am used to staying by myself. You care for nothing but your old business."

"Sit down, Neva," he commanded coolly as he crossed the room, locked the door and put the key in his pocket.

Too much surprised at his unexpected move to protest she sat down.

"We might as well settle this at once," he continued in curt, business-like tones that he might have addressed to a stranger. "You have robbed me of the domestic happiness I had a right to expect, but I cannot allow you to destroy my business also. I have spent practically all my life building it up. It seems that financial success is the only recompense I can expect from my work, therefore I cannot allow a jealous, nagging wife to interfere with its attainment." He paused for her to consider this point.

"I am through trying to win you to any reasonable view of life; my visions of a happy home have vanished. However, I shall try to adjust myself to the new conditions. This everlasting wrangling has got to stop. Unless you can treat me civilly I shall arrange for a boarding place down town and you can fly into your rages alone. I am going over to Smith's now. I'll be back in a couple of hours."

For several weeks following this interview the unhappy husband and wife treated each other with an icy politeness that was even more trying than the turbulent quarrels had been. They were preparing for a trip north when the final storm struck them. They had planned for months to spend the Christmas holidays in New York, where David was compelled to go to look after some business affairs. Neva, who had never been east of Chicago, was anticipating the trip with great pleasure despite her strained relations with her husband. In discussing their plans they almost forgot their grievances as the day of departure drew near.

It was only an hour until train time when David arrived at his home to dress and pack for the journey. He found Neva already dressed and busily engaged in packing. Her suit and hat were new and very smart. He realized that he had never before seen the clothes she was packing.

"Your suit is very becoming," he remarked pleasantly. "I'm glad to see you have bought you some new clothes. I'm afraid I've been too busy to notice that you needed them. I only wish Old Claymore had sent up the bills before I leave. I don't like to let unpaid accounts go over the holidays."

"Oh, there won't be any bills," she replied carelessly. "I charged them to Daddy."

"You what?" David stared at her, eyes and mouth agape.

"I charged them to Daddy," she repeated calmly. "He doesn't mind in the least. I've always done that since you first complained about my bills."

For the first time in his tempestuous married life David completely lost control of his temper. The blood surged into his face as the wave of furious anger submerged him.

"How dare you do such a thing? What can your father think of me? What will people say? I'll have you understand that while you are my wife I will pay your bills, Mrs. Gains!" he stormed.

"Perhaps you think you are talking to your office boy," she replied coolly. "I shall do exactly as I please about it."

She laid her hat on the bed and began to remove her coat.

"Put your hat back on; we have to hurry. It is nearly train time now."

"I am not going," she announced.

"Suit yourself." He jammed his hat down on his head, picked up his hastily packed hand-bag and left the house.

Neva watched him until he was out of sight then sat down to think over the situation. She realized that something must be done. But what? She had no precedents to follow.

"I know," she concluded. "I'll ask Anne Reed. She has been married five years. I'm sure she can help me."

She waited until she knew Anne's household tasks for the day were done before she went to tell her troubles.

"Why, you little goose," her friend laughed when Neva told her tragic story. "You don't mean to tell me you've missed a trip to New York just because you had a misunderstanding with David. Why don't you kiss and make up and forget all about it when you quarrel? That is the way everybody else does."

Neva shook her head thoughtfully. "Maybe they do," she conceded. "But we can't. It is wrecking my nerves and David looks ten years older than he did six months ago."

She returned to her home, hurriedly packed up enough clothes to last the two weeks of David's absence, called a taxi and was driven to her father's home. Her mother was highly indignant when she heard Neva's story.

"The idea that any man should treat my daughter so," Mrs. Redmond exclaimed. "Why hadn't you told me before, dear? No wonder you look all tired out."

"Let us try to be fair, Mother. I have been as much to blame as David; perhaps more so. The question is what am I to do about it?"

"What are you to do? Why, come back home, of course. You can't be happy with a man who treats you like a child."

"I am afraid that I have acted like a child—a badly spoiled one at that. But your suggestion doesn't help, Mother. Perhaps I cannot be happy with David, but I am quite certain that I cannot be happy without him." Neva's anger was all gone now and her clever brain was beginning to work in earnest. She went up to her old room and sat by the window until the loneliness became unbearable.

"I think I'll consult Daddy," she told her reflection in the mirror as she adjusted her hat. "I've often heard David say that he is one of the shrewdest lawyers in this state."

"Why, Neva, I thought you were on your way to New York," was her father's greeting when she entered his office. "Sit down here in this big chair I keep for my clients."

Hastily, lest her courage ebb away, Neva plunged into the tragic tale of her domestic woes.

It was John Redmond's first impulse to take his daughter in his arms and comfort her with loving words. Before her story was finished, however, he realized that here was no child grieving for a broken toy, but a woman who needed his best counsel. Her anxious face and nervous gestures told her story far more eloquently than any words could do.

"The trouble seems to be that you have never found time to grow up, while David has never really been a youngster," he told her judiciously. "He thinks life should be all work and you want it to be all play. Both of you are wrong and will have to change your views if you want to live sanely and happily. How much of your time can you spare me while he is gone?"

"All of it."

"Very well, my dear. The best I can do for you is to teach you what life has taught me and tell you how other people succeed or fail. Perhaps I should have undertaken this before you married, but experience has taught me that it is a waste of time to instruct people before they are ready to learn."

Those two weeks spent in her father's office were a revelation to Neva Gains. She got her first glimpse of humanity earning its daily bread. The romance and tragedy of the world at work were full of absorbing interest for the girl who had only known the play side of life.

"Daddy, I'm beginning to see that you are quite an interesting person," she told her father one day. "You seem to know everybody from the merchant princes to the office boys. Now that story you just told me about the plain looking little woman in the office across the street is positively exciting. Think of starting to work at eight dollars a week and building up to a hundred a week in less than ten years. It is wonderful. But I suppose such careers are very rare and only attained by women of exceptional ability."

"Many women have done better," he asserted.

"Who are they?"

"Well, William Shackleford has made at least a half-million dollars in the past twenty-five years; Dr. Mathews is a successful surgeon; Emil Brownlee's books have brought fame as well as fortune to their author; and there is James Crosby of the City National Bank who draws a magnificent salary and owns stacks of bank stock."

"Oh, yes, I know all those and scores of other men who are brilliant successes, but I am talking about women," Neva interrupted. "How many such women do you know?"

"Nine tenths of the prosperous men I know are married. Of course some few have succeeded in spite of their wives, but the vast majority of them are just the result of some clever, loving woman's work. Take me, for instance. Do you suppose that left to myself I would have reached my present standing in my chosen profession? I know better and suspect your mother does, too. She always let me know that she expected me to make good and praised me generously when I did. I've won many a case by sheer perseverance and hard work that I never would have done but for her encouragement. And the failures—for there have been failures—hurt her more keenly than they hurt me, for her never-failing sympathy always healed my wounds and sent me forth stronger for the next battle."

"I see," Neva remarked thoughtfully. "But if mother is such a model wife why couldn't she have given me the benefit of her experiences?"

"She has always regarded you as a being entirely apart from the problems of the every-day world. Sensible as she is about everything else, she can not believe that you were created for any purpose but to be spoiled and pampered. Before you were old enough to know about it we had many serious disagreements about the way you should be brought up. She had her way, of course, but I hope no permanent harm has been done. Lack of sensible training is a handicap that a great many girls with over-indulgent mothers have to struggle against when the real problems of life confront them."

"I want you to spend the day with me at the court-house instead of at my office, Neva," her father said one morning at the breakfast table.

"All right," she replied. "You know this is the last day I can be with you. David is coming home this afternoon. Do you have a case in court today?"

"No, I haven't any particular business. I just want you to see a bit of life that may interest you."

Five minutes before the hour when business began there the two entered Judge Jackson's court-room and were pleasantly greeted by that gentleman. Though Neva had never been in the room before, she had met the judge many times at her father's home. He had always seemed just a dull, good-natured old man, rather fond of stale jokes and evil-smelling cigars, but, seated

After 10 Days

Your teeth may also glisten

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Millions of teeth now glisten as they have not done before. You see them everywhere.

A new method of teeth cleaning has, in late years, come into very wide use. Thousands of dentists are urging it. Multitudes of people have proved it and adopted it. And every person is now offered a free ten-day test.

To combat the film

The purpose is to combat the film which causes most tooth troubles. Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. In the months between your dental cleanings it may do a ceaseless damage.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Very few escape

Very few people have escaped some of these tooth troubles, despite the daily brushing. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve film, so the tooth brush has left much of it intact.

Dental research has for many years sought a way to fight this film, and the way has now been found. Many clinical tests have amply proved its efficiency. And now leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And millions of people are now enjoying its benefits.

Sent to any one who asks

The Pepsodent results are quick and apparent. Everyone who sees them will desire them. So, to spread the facts, a 10-Day Tube is sent to anyone who asks.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

A new discovery has made pepsin possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But now a harmless activating method enables us to constantly fight the film-coat in this way.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Do this now, for few things are more important. The results may be life-long in extent. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

The New-Day Dentifrice

The scientific film combatant, combined with two other modern requisites. Now advised by leading dentists everywhere and supplied by all druggists in large tubes.

Sewing Conveniences

If you can do even the simplest sort of crocheting, you must make yourself and your friends one of the little crocheted silk embroidery scissors holders. These consist simply of a cork crocheted around in silk everywhere except the top surface, and with a crocheted string or handle to which the scissors are attached. Then when they are not in use the points are stuck into the cork and they are out of harm's way.

An accompaniment of this, not quite so new, but very useful, is a tiny glass medicine vial without a lid, crocheted all over very finely. into it are dropped broken needles and bent pins, and they are far safer there than thrown carelessly on the floor or in the waste basket. When the vial is full slip off the silk—a little drawing string at the bottom permits this—and empty it, burying the needles in the earth or throwing them in the fire.

These two little sewing conveniences, attached by a bit of ribbon of the same color, will make welcome gifts or will find a ready sale at your next church fair.

Handy Scrapbag

The woman who uses a sewing machine will do well to make herself a good-sized bag that can be attached to the side frame of the machine and used to collect all scraps and bits of thread left from the sewing.

Select an embroidery hoop eight inches in diameter and cretonne 16 inches long and 14 inches wide. Sew the ends and one side together and turn the edge of the other side over the hoop and run a gathering thread in the hem thus formed. When finished draw up the thread the size of the hoop and catch it tight. This will make a bag that is gathered on to the hoop and is amply full in body to hold a goodly number of scraps before it is necessary to empty.

Another sewing help is to have a pattern bag hung back of the machine. Make inside pockets to this bag in which you can keep the patterns belonging to the different members of the family. Have also two extra pockets that hold patterns of fancy aprons, bags or dress accessories.

A deal of time and strength can be saved in the hunting of patterns and picking up bits off the floor if your machine is equipped with these two handy bags.

New Nightgowns

A decidedly new and pretty idea for nightgowns is a combination of sheer dotted Swiss or cross-barred dimity and plain nainsook.

The Swiss or dimity is used for the upper or yoke part and the sleeves, while the plain goods is utilized for the balance of the garment.

This combination is expressly pretty in making an Empire style nightgown, the different materials being joined at the bust-line by sheer ribbon and beading.

The girl who makes her own under muslins might vary this a little by using all-over embroidery in place of the dotted Swiss. Any clever woman will see numberless pretty possibilities in thus combining two materials.

To Hem Table-Linen

When hemming table-linen by hand, especially the heavy double damask, it is much easier to work rapidly and obtain a neat, fine stitch if the edges of the hem are slightly dampened.

This softens the linen, so that when the hem is turned you can make a tiny over-and-over stitch.

Keep the emery-bag close by, for the dampened linen will rust your needle if it is not frequently cleaned.

If the edges of fine linen for handkerchiefs or lingerie are slightly dampened before rolling to whip on a lace edge, it will be easier to roll neatly.

TATTED COLLAR.

Spool Holders

Did you ever go hastily to your sewing basket and find all the thread unwound and tangled? If you ever did, you will appreciate the very simple holder for spools of cotton and silk described here. In size and scope it may be varied as you please, but the sample I am describing is just about what the average housewife needs.

The foundation is a board 12 by 8 inches, and a half inch thick. Into this drive two rows of six long nails, each long enough, that is, for their points to project through to the other side, the length (almost) of a spool.

On the board mark in plain figures above the top row, "20, 30, 40, 50, 60, 70." In the top row put your black thread and the white thread under the corresponding numbers below.

If you wish to add a row of colored silks, mark them also, the proper color under each.

So that the spools shall not fall off the nails, drop a bit of hot sealing wax at the top of each nail. This will prevent hurting the hand on the sharp nails also. When the spool is exhausted it is easy to knock off the sealing wax and apply new.

Put screw at the back of this board and hang it up by your work table or sewing machine. You will find it one of the most useful articles in the room.

Substitute for Bodkin

If a bodkin is not at hand, an excellent substitute is a wooden match.

First strike the head; let it blaze a moment and blow out the flame. Cut or break off the burnt end, then wrap the ribbon or tape firmly about the end of the matchstick and push it through the hem, as is done with a bodkin. If held firmly, the tape or ribbon will not slip.

Leave It To The Girls

By Frances L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE wage for a woman by the day has gone up in the larger cities of the United States from $1.50 to $3.50 a day, and car fare, in the last three years, with the service not as good, and the woman coming in by the day keeping strict observance of bankers' hours.

The situation has become extremely difficult for mothers of small children; those whose hands are so filled with little tasks that there is no time left for such larger ones as doing the laundry or scrubbing the floor. Help is out of the question; even when a woman can afford it, she finds it increasingly hard to get, though willing to pay any price or make any concessions.

"How many in family?" asked an applicant for a place recently. "Do you have company? I will not work where there are guests. Do you have more than three courses at a meal? I will not work for you if you do. I expect my day's work to end at seven promptly, and will not, under any conditions, do the work of another maid during her absence."

The woman was hard pressed for assistance, but even this was too much for her. Her replies were worded to please the maid, and the girl announced that she would come.

"But wait," said the mistress of the household; "I want to ask you some questions. It is only fair, isn't it? Do you play the piano?"

The girl stammered a surprised "No."

"Then I don't want you," said the woman. "I refuse to have any girl in my kitchen who can't play the piano."

She told the story as a joke to her friends and it caused a hilarity that did not last. For the applicant for work told all other would-be applicants, and now the woman can't get help for love or money. All because she refused to be as humble as the times seemingly demanded.

"I don't know whatever I will do," sighed a little white-haired woman when her cook announced she was leaving a place where she had worked nine years, her wages having gone up in that time from three dollars a week to ten; "I can't pay you the fifteen you ask. We simply can't afford it. But who will do my cooking for me?"

"I'll show you," replied the departing cook. Picking up a hand mirror, she thrust it before the face of the woman who had been uniformly considerate of her for nine years. "There she is! She in that glass is the one who will cook for you." Then, throwing the mirror to the floor with a crash, as if to invoke bad luck on such a household, she went out and slammed the door.

Women took their husbands and babies into boarding houses to escape this household problem, and they arrived in such numbers, proprietors of boarding houses also became infected with the germ of revolt and refused to admit families with babies. If a woman has a cook, it means at least forty dollars a month, not counting the waste by that rare creature. If she does the cooking herself, and hires a nursemaid, she may save ten dollars, but not a cent more. Young girls coming in by the day to help out charge six and eight dollars a week, and the benefits resulting to the household are doubtful.

Things were in this state in a town in Colorado when the Girl Scouts came to the unhappy householders' relief. They hire themselves out at 25 cents an hour, and in this way this little city is finding the problem of domestic help solved.

The girls enroll at headquarters for the job they like best: Mending, doing dishes, caring for the baby, baking, sweeping, dusting, reading to the sick—oh, there are a hundred and one odd jobs a willing pair of hands may find to do; and some Girl Scout has qualified herself to do many of them.

The applicant for an assistant applies at headquarters, and tells her needs. Before the Girl Scout is permitted to go to her home, the place is investigated, and unless listed as desirable, the girl cannot go. There are certain rules to be obeyed: The girl must be paid promptly, she must not be retained after dark and she must not be given a task too heavy for such young shoulders.

THE GIRL SCOUTS TO THE RESCUE.

The housekeepers are finding the service ideal! School over, a Girl Scout appears to take care of the children while their mother does her shopping or attends to neglected social duties. They take the baby out if the mother is engaged; they are invaluable assistants in getting up company meals and some of the girls are so skilled they do all the catering for parties, while others enroll only as fitted to answer the door, take telephone messages, help serve, etc.

The plan has worked so well that organizations of Girl Scouts in other cities are adopting it. It is always possible to get a Girl Scout to help out, but so far this little town in Colorado is the only place they are duly registered for such service.

The girls are paid not less than 25 cents an hour. It is their pin money. They are honest, faithful, and loyal. Their vows and obligations to enter the Girl Scout order, and which they must live up to, lift them immeasurably above the incompetent and faithless help so many are compelled to put up with.

Leave it to the girls! They are solving a national problem, one that older heads have failed to solve. Many ways have been tried. One, given much publicity, was the engaging of a maid on the eight-hour system, treating her as a stenographer is treated in an office, calling her Miss Smith, instead of Lizzie, and expecting her to get her meals on the outside,—for she does not get her meals in an office, does she?

It sounded promising. It has not been the success it was hoped. It was one of many hopeless plans. The one which is doing the work originated in the heads of fourteen-year-old girls.

Driven Apart

own this place for a week, an' I'll throw in my sarvices."

Berdyne drew a roll of bills from his pocket. The old hag eyed the money greedily, and snatched the bank notes which Berdyne handed to her.

"I do not know how long I shall want the place," said Berdyne, "but I don't think it will be for a week. There's your hundred, anyhow. While I am here we must have this place to ourselves. No one is to be admitted save those whom I shall tell you to let in."

"That goes without sayin'," replied the old crone. "This here's a fine place for gents as wants privacy. Even if the perlice should come, there's ways to shake 'em." She laughed cunningly. "The chinks had the house afore I got it," she went on, "an' wherever you find chinks, you'll find secret panels, hidden holes, and underground burrows. The cops can surround the house, while others go through it from top to bottom, but one as knows the place can fade away as if the 'quake had opened up an' took him in."

"She's got it straight," seconded Gorsline; "this here's a rum old place. I've ducked away from the cops many a time in this old shanty. It's a piece o' Chinatown, when it comes to ways for makin' a getaway."

"Have you a comfortable room and a decent bed?" asked Berdyne.

"Sure," shrilled the woman; "my customers ain't all from the slums. More than one of Oakland's and Berkeley's upper ten comes here for a quiet pull at the pipe. How could I hold the trade if I didn't have the right sort of accommodations? You've paid your money like a gent, and, as I says, the place is your'n for a week."

"How about a bit of liquor and something to eat?"

"I've that, too."

"Show me the room," said Berdyne, "and then bring up the food and drink. I'm tired out. I didn't sleep any last night, and a day such as I've had in Frisco would wipe out a man of iron."

The hag took another lamp out of the cupboard, lighted it, and piloted Berdyne back into the hall and up a flight of crazy stairs to the second floor. Here she unlocked and threw open a door which led into a roomy chamber, papered, carpeted, and furnished in a way that was really out of all keeping with the cheerless passage and the bare room which Berdyne had already seen. A glow of satisfaction pervaded him with the thought that, in carrying out his nefarious designs, he was not to be denied all the comforts to which he had been accustomed.

"My name is Neil Preston," said he, as the woman was about to leave after setting down the lamp, but sometimes I use the name of Berdyne. If any one should come and ask for me, under either of those two names, let me know at once who it is."

"Sure," smirked the hag. "I'm used to dealin' with gents as has, sometimes, half-a-dozen names. But what's in a name? Nothin', as I can see, but a little convenience an' safety. I'll bring the spirits an' the food right away."

After he had eaten some food and fortified himself with strong drink, Berdyne crept into bed. He was very positive that if his treacherous schemes succeeded, it could not possibly be before the following day. Perhaps two or three days might pass before the net he had spread would snare its victims. And perhaps—he ground his teeth as he thought of it—all his plans might prove futile.

If Preston should meet Beryl in the city, then the forging of the notices would at once be known, and the clever plots would fall to the ground. But the narrow margin by which a meeting had been averted at the house in Sutter Street led Berdyne to feel that luck was with him. And he was a firm believer in luck.

In the small hours of the morning Berdyne was awakened from a sound sleep by Gorsline.

"What do you want?" asked Berdyne sleepily.

"Hargreaves has shown up," answered Gorsline.

"Did Trenwyck send him?"

"No; I passed the word to some of my friends, who had seen Hargreaves, to be on the lookout for him. One of them sent him over."

"Send him here," returned Berdyne, instantly awake.

Hargreaves, haggard and exhausted, came to the room and sank wearily into a chair.

"What about that trunk?" demanded Berdyne.

"Burned, Mr. Berdyne," replied Hargreaves. "When the fire reached the hotel, a load of trunks was piled onto a dray, but before we got beyond the fire lines the horses were taken off the dray, and I couldn't do a thing."

"That's bad enough," muttered Berdyne; "but it might be worse. You're sure the contents of the trunk went up in smoke?"

"I don't know, sir," replied Hargreaves, brushing a hand across his forehead.

"You don't know!" snapped Berdyne.

Hargreaves described how masonry had fallen on the van, scattered the load of trunks, and broke some of them open.

"I seen a man rush back," he went on, "but the smoke was thick, and I couldn't make him out. When the smoke blowed away I saw him plain. He was on his knees among the papers, and seemed to be looking them over. It was Neil Preston, sir."

Berdyne's heavy face purpled with anger and chagrin.

"Preston!" he gasped. "What devilish chance brought him there at that time?"

"I don't know, sir, but while he was looking at the papers, a soldier, who took him for a looter, fired at him."

A faint hope struggled into Berdyne's black eyes.

"Was he killed?" he eagerly asked.

"I think not, but I didn't see him after that."

"Are you telling me the truth?" hissed Berdyne, striding up to the man and glaring into his eyes, "or have you sold out to Preston?"

at his high desk in this grim bare room, he looked very solemn and terrible.

Young Mrs. Gains listened to the proceedings of the court curiously at first, then with intense interest as she realized their nature. Divorce suits were disposed of with neatness and dispatch that seemed incredible to her. The unruffled manner and calm voice of the judge as he tried case after case filled her with resentment.

"How can he look on so coldly when lives are being wrecked before him?" she whispered dramatically to her father, her dark eyes revealing the horror she felt.

"But they are not, my dear. Listen to the evidence. The wrecking, as you call it, is already accomplished; this is a mere recital of it."

Neva was glad when her father told her that it was lunch time, not that she was hungry, but because she had seen so many sad faces and heard so many unhappy stories she longed to leave the grim scenes and forget them if she could.

"Daddy," she said, as they ate their lunch in a pleasant little restaurant, "I always thought that divorces were caused by some great tragedy, some overwhelming cataclysm that no one could prevent. But they aren't. They just begin as petty little quarrels that grow and grow like the fabled turnip until they can grow no more."

"You are quite observant," he told her approvingly. "My, what a lawyer you would have made if you had been a boy!"

She laughed lightly at this. "Oh, I might have made a very good one anyway. But engineering is more to my taste. If you do not believe it, just watch the future career of one David Gains. You have been wonderful to me these two weeks, Daddy. I shall try to remember all the useful things you have told me. I must go home now. My house needs a little dusting and I must cook David's supper."

When David reached home that evening he was surprised to see lights gleaming from the windows. He had not expected to find his wife at home. Unconsciously he braced himself to meet a storm of tears and reproaches. As he opened the door he heard swift footsteps crossing the dining-room and a moment later Neva faced him in the brightly lighted hall. She wore one of the soft clinging dresses that he always admired so much and her face was wreathed in the old happy smile. His first thought was that there was company.

"Oh, David, I'm so glad to see you," she cried, extending her hands in happy welcome. "I thought this dreadful two weeks would never end."

"Neva, Neva," he said as his arms closed hungrily about her, "I cannot live without you. Do whatever you choose, if you will only love me I'll never criticize you again."

"I will try not to give you any cause to, David," she replied very gently. "There, get ready for supper while I finish setting the table."

Over the well-cooked, daintily-served meal they found many interesting things to talk about.

"How soon can you go to New York?" David asked casually.

"To New York? What do you mean?"

"Why, our delayed holiday——"

"But haven't you just come from New York?"

"No."

"David, where have you been?"

"Staying at a hotel down town."

Driven Apart

"I wouldn't be here, sir," returned the valet, "if I had taken money from Mr. Preston for anything that was in the trunk. I'm giving you the truth. I did all that a man could to save the trunk, but it was no use."

With a final, searching glance at his valet, Berdyne turned away and began striding up and down the room.

"Go downstairs, Hargreaves," said he finally, "and tell the woman to give you a place to sleep. Send Gorsline here."

Hargreaves, glad to get off so easily, went away, and in a little time Gorsline once more presented himself.

"You owe Neil Preston a debt of vengeance, I believe?" said Berdyne tentatively, a murderous ring in his calm, even tones.

"I could kill him on sight!" gritted Gorsline. "He had me going in that Sutter Street house—and a curse on that lawyer of yours because of it!"

Berdyne leaned toward his confederate, his evil face flushed with a deadly hate.

"Will you turn the trick?" he breathed hoarsely. "If that man lives, it is more than likely it will spell my ruin."

"Ha!" returned Gorsline, with a significant look. "If the gal's a widow, you can still play your cards to win her. Is that it?"

"Have it as you will," returned Berdyne. "Do the work, and if Preston has any papers in his possession, turn them over to me. If the law interferes, I will stand behind you with my last dollar."

"Where am I goin' to get my chance at him?" asked the ruffian, after a period of reflection. "Must I go back to Frisco and try to run afoul of his course?"

"We will wait for a while and see what those notices amount to. If nothing comes of them, your business will be to find Neil Preston and sweep him from my path. That will be all. I think we understand each other."

Gorsline, with a final leer at Berdyne, slunk from the room. There was no more sleep for Berdyne that night. He coveted the pure, sweet loveliness of the helpless girl he had so persistently persecuted, but it was not his evil passion alone that goaded him on. Only by making her his could he save himself from financial wreck. "Ruin! Ruin!" a mocking voice screeched in his ears. And for once his dark soul cowered before the thought of what the future might hold in store.

CHAPTER XXXI.

IN THE MIDST OF FOES.

Fortunately for the stream of refugees flowing out of the stricken city, the great ferry building at the foot of Market Street was saved from earthquake and flames. The clock in the high tower had been stilled by the shock, its hands mutely indicating the hour of the catastrophe. Boats were running across the bay as rapidly as they could receive and discharge passengers and make the trip. On the outward journey the boats were packed, but on the return trip the passengers were limited to various officials connected with the maintenance of order, the distributing of supplies and the giving of relief. It was easy enough to leave the city, but ironclad rules governed a return to it.

Beryl and Tonita, overjoyed with the thought that Neil was waiting at the end of their journey, clung to each other in the terrific press of humanity that surged through the ferry building, and were swept upon the decks of the heavily laden boat.

Steadily they drew away from the blazing metropolis, overhung by its black pall of smoke. They did not look long at this, the scene of so much sorrow, but turned their eyes toward the fairer shores to the eastward. In due course they reached the Oakland wharf. Here they were halted by an official of one of the many relief committees, who wished to know whether they desired to reach friends at a distance, or to find shelter in one of the refugee camps. Railroad transportation was free to any one who desired to take the trains for distant parts.

Tonita showed the officer the typewritten scrap which had brought so much hope and joy to the heart of her friend. The officer wrinkled his brows thoughtfully as he looked at it.

"J Street," he muttered, looking at the two girls perplexedly. He could not reconcile the character of the place with the loveliness of the two young refugees. "You are quite sure this is for you?" he asked.

"Oh, yes!" cried Beryl confidently.

"And the one who signs the notice is——"

"My husband!" she answered.

"Ah!" This official, like all the others, was overworked. He could not give one moment longer than was absolutely necessary to any particular case. "Very well," he said, handing back the typewritten slip; "we have some vehicles here for the use of Frisco people, and I will send you to your destination in one of them."

Five minutes later the girls were being whirled away in a carriage. Beryl was trembling with impatience and anticipation. Tonita, while she had her own worries on her lover's account, was so unselfish that she could forget them, for the time, in her delight over her friend's good fortune.

"Why, dearest," she gayly murmured, placing her arm about Beryl's waist and drawing her close, "you are shaking like a leaf!"

"I could cry for joy, Tonita!" answered Beryl softly. "How long it seems since I have seen Neil! It is as though years and years have passed since we stood before the minister and sealed our love with a tie there is no breaking."

"You have suffered a cruel ordeal, darling," answered Tonita. "A whole lifetime of events has been crowded into the bitter hours since you and your sweetheart were riven asunder. Then, too, you know," she added, with a tender smile:

"Love reckons hours for months, and days for years;
And every little absence is an age!"

Beryl, impulsively, pressed her lips to her friend's.

"I think of only myself!" she exclaimed in a burst of self-reproach. "You are also separated from your lover——"

"Still," interrupted Tonita, a flash of sorrow crossing her face, "I can hope on, keep my trust in Heaven, and be happy with you. You have found your heart's love; and so, in time, I shall find mine."

In a little while the carriage came to a stop, and the driver swung down from his seat and opened the door. He looked curiously at the girls as he assisted them to alight.

"You got friends here, ain't you?" he asked, staring toward the gloomy barrier of trees with something like suspicion.

"Yes," answered Beryl, scarcely hearing what he said because of her impatience.

"Then I reckon it's all right," returned the driver. "There are so many refugees comin' to Oakland that they have to be put in all sorts o' places." He started to mount to his seat, but paused with one foot on the step. "Want me to go in with you?" he asked.

"You are very kind," Beryl called to him, "but it will not be necessary." Then she hurried on along the weed-grown gravel walk, keeping several paces ahead of Tonita in her eagerness.

Like all the rest of the overworked people engaged in helping the refugees, the driver of the carriage had not a moment to waste. So he, like the relief officer, dismissed the girls from his mind. Mounting to his seat, he drove off, and thus the last one who could have prevented the helpless victims from entering the serpent's lair vanished from the scene.

Tonita was sufficiently collected to take note of the unsavory surroundings, but her suspicions of treachery were not aroused. She merely wondered how it could have chanced that Senor Preston had come to take shelter in that squalid place. Beryl's little hand was rapping excitedly at the door before Tonita had passed the fringe of trees; and by the time the Mexicana had reached her friend's side the door opened, and the sharp-featured, repulsive face of Marm Kinney was revealed.

The old hag wore a smile intended to be ingratiating, but which only succeeded in making her the more hideous. Tonita drew back in alarm, but poor, deceived Beryl's agitated spirit left no room for doubts or fears.

"Ha, my little beauties!" exclaimed Marm Kinney, taking note of the girl's loveliness with a sordid eye; "what can I do for ye?"

"My husband!" returned Beryl breathlessly; I understand that he is here waiting for me."

"What is your husband's name, my purty one?"

"Mr. Neil Preston——"

The door was thrown wide open.

"He is here, sure enough," said the ill-omened hag, stepping back, "an' almost crazy is he," she added, "with the long wait for you to come. Your friend, nodding toward Tonita, "can step into the back room an' find a chair. I'll take you upstairs to Mr. Preston."

Tonita, vaguely uneasy, passed on into the rear room, while Beryle hastened up the old stairs after the shuffling figure of Marm Kinney.

"In there," said Marm Kinney, halting in the bare corridor of the second floor and indicating a door. Walk right in, my girl."

Beryl's heart was beating in her throat as she laid hands on the doorknob, opened the door and passed into the room beyond.

"Neil!" she cried; "Neil!"

Hurried footsteps struck on her ears, and she turned to see a form rush from a closet, shut the door by which she had entered, and turn a key in the lock.

"So!" cried the man, his face filled with a horrid, gloating triumph, "my plot has succeeded! My loved one has come all the way from the doomed city to find me! Did you think, my ravishing beauty, that you could escape Nicholas Berdyne?"

Not a word, not a sound came from Beryl's lips. Her face turned white and frozen with horror. A mocking laugh smote on her ears from beyond the door; from somewhere below she heard a stifled scream and a sound of quick movements. Then, overcome by the awful realization that broke over her, she tottered and fell unconscious into the hateful arms of Berdyne.

this way as long as the children are healthy, but I am not. Last winter was the worst we ever had to contend with for we didn't raise even a potato. As for clothing we simply don't have any except what we can find. I patch and patch so we won't have to be ragged. My baby sits on my lap as I am writing and her apron is made of old overalls, her dress of two colors, red sleeves, checked body, made of an old dress, her underskirt made of an old shirt given to me) and her shirt made of the legs of an old union suit, her stockings made of black tights. Her shoes were new, bought for her, but now her little toes are sticking out of them. Of course she doesn't care so long as she is comfortable but she is only a baby and her pride isn't developed.

I wish I could get something to do. I would like to make up quilt tops on the shares or something of that sort. I almost know there are lots of people who do not care to piece quilts yet need them. I make for myself crazy quilt tops of calico, gingham and similar goods, by piecing on paper and when finished I tear off the paper. And I use the narrow strips for log cabin blocks. I cut the larger pieces in squares, according to size of scraps, but all are given me by friends.

I use pieces of worn-out clothes, such as men's suits for clothes for the boys, the leftovers for quilt tops. I also use leftover underwear for tops, after I dye them.

I am teaching my six-year-old to read, also the four-year-old. My two eldest girls are working for their board and going to school, away from our own neighborhood and not together. My eldest boy herds sheep but he should be in school.

I lost my flock of hens last week. A coyote got into the henhouse and killed all but one. I had her taken to the barn and yesterday a horse stepped on her and she had to be killed. Five of my hens had taken to roosting in the barn just a few days before the coyote went into the henhouse so there are five left out of my flock. I had pure bred White Wyandottes. Later that day Mr. M. shot the coyote. It was an old mangy one with no hair left except a strip down its back.

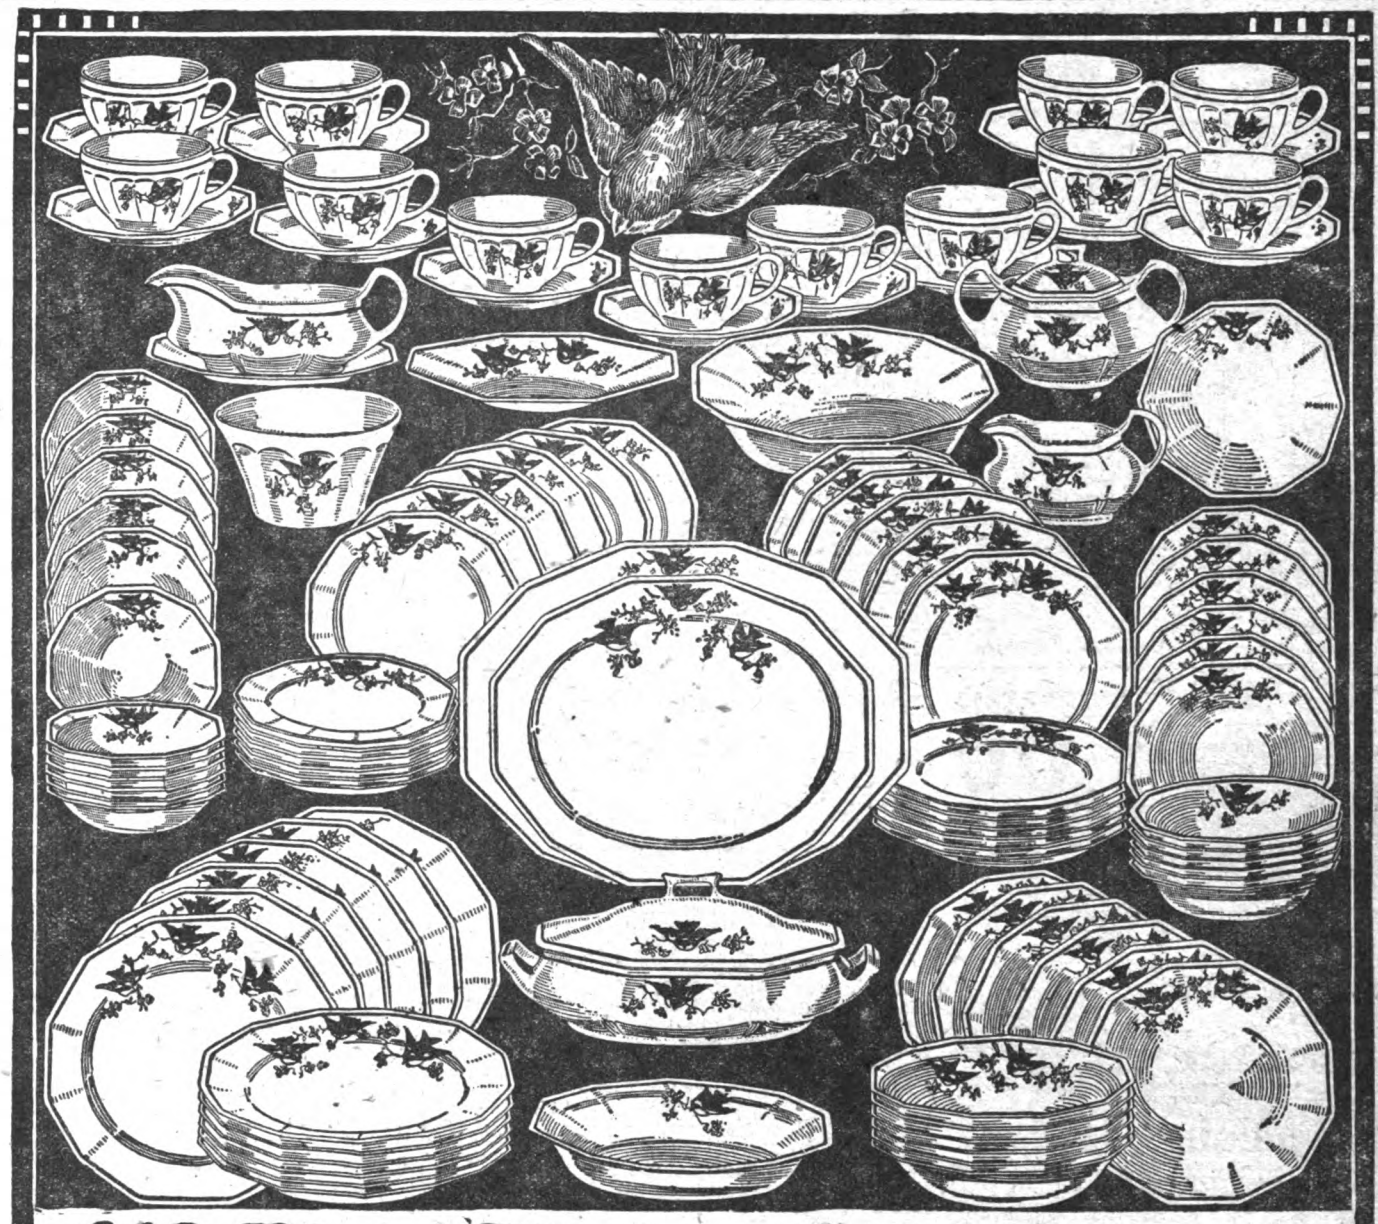
I wonder if anyone can tell me where I can get a spinning wheel. I want to learn to spin.

If it wasn't for COMFORT our reading would be a great deal more limited than it is. I've thought every year I would subscribe for the Youth's Companion for the three oldest children but every year finds my pocketbook flatter than the year before.

EDITH WAIT MELLIS.

Mrs. Mellis.—The majority of us can sympathize with you for there are times when the coyotes get into our henhouses too—figuratively speaking, of course, and everything seems to go dead wrong, but I'm sure such a brave, resourceful woman as you have proven yourself to be will win out in the end, so keep up your courage. Sisters, I have some nickels and dimes that are anxious to be used to pay freight or express charges on apples, or fruit of any kind, for Mrs. Mellis and her children. I'm sure even "seconds" would be appreciated. How about it?—Ed.

KANSAS.



DEAR SISTERS:

I've knocked several times but it must be that Mrs. Wilkinson has her deaf ear this way. I'm coming in anyway. I'm a small person five feet, three inches tall and weigh 190 pounds. Am 25 years old and wear spectacles. Married four years to the best old man on earth. He is thirty-nine years old, a six-footer and weighs 200 pounds. I lost my baby, a sweet girl ten months old, two years ago and my home is lonely and still now. The war took my only brother and I am proud of my gold star, though it cost much.

I have taken COMFORT since my marriage, and it was in my old home ever since I can remember. I enjoy the Sisters' Corner very much and particularly the pictures of the babies and the letters on child training. It is my ambition to be a good mother and if I have no more of my own I shall take some who have no home. It takes three P's to care for children, prayer, pluck and perseverance.

I think we have solved the money question. We have one pocketbook and each uses what is needed, always consulting the other about the purchase and my check is as good as my husband's. He says we are friendly dog, I will house and feed a friendly man, but when both go mad and start to destroy me, they will get bullets and not grub. The only bread and butter work I have done in the last five years or so, has been to contribute a column or two to COMFORT, and if you think there is a fortune in running a department in a household magazine you've got another think coming. Remember, the price of paper has gone up 80 per cent and it's hard to get at any price. If I could only be a millionaire paperhanger instead of an impecunious paper spoiler, I could revel in riches. But, alas, age and invalidism have forever closed that golden gate to me. For the last three years I've spent my life in a bed that has only three legs. Morgan, Rockefeller and Wall Street ought to buy me a new one, but they simply won't do it. Ungrateful wretches! The only subsidized press I know is the Bolshevik press, run chiefly by the rascals who turned the socialist movement over to the murderous Kaiser,—oh, yes, and the gutter press which, thanks to your liberal patronage, Hans, needs no subsidy. I have written several letters to this Red subsidized press but the Jews and Germans who control it would never print them. They are as afraid of the truth as you are, Hans Noodlesoup. Now, Hans, if you'll cut out the dollar cigars and ten-dollar silk shirts, and come and mend our leaky roof, whitewash our ceiling and carve a new leg for my bed, I'll be greatly obliged. Landlords make no repairs these days. You are right, Hans, wise men do change their minds, but I fear that is a luxury you are constitutionally incapable of indulging in.

RICHMOND, R. R. 2, Care of Frank Ottman, Mo.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am eighteen years old and live in the country. I am in love with a girl the same age as myself. She is redheaded. The people here make fun of me for going with her to church. She is not exactly pretty but I don't think it is looks that make a girl, but character. She is a nice, Christian young lady. I don't pay any attention to any other girl. I love this one, no matter what others may think. I would like to have you tell me what you think about this love mater—character before looks. Awaiting an early answer,

Your nephew, JAMES CARLE MANLEY.

James, your letter shows sense and character far beyond your years. Don't take any notice of that bunch of hoodlums who are making fun of you and your red-headed sweetheart. I'll bet if you were to drop her the whole bunch would be on her trail in a moment. Of course, if her hair was Bolshevik red and her ideas and principles harmonized with the color of her tresses, I might advise a temporary separation until the young lady had recovered her economic sanity and her fiery locks did not give warning of her intentions to rob, plunder and pillage all within reach. God bless the so-called red-headed girls, I wish we had a few million more of them, for they are warm-hearted, affectionate and temperamental. There is a restaurant in one of our biggest cities where all the waitresses have inflammatory locks, carroty tresses, or otherwise red hair. You have to fight to get a seat in that beanery and there is a waiting line a mile long outside. Envious folk may make fun of the red-headed girl, but every real man adores her. I'm glad the young lady in question is a Christian and that you both attend the same church. I attended a church once where there were five red-headed girls, and they were there all at one and the same time, but it was a stone, fireproof church, with nothing inflammable around and nobody worried. I'm glad you have the courage to take the young lady to church in the day, instead of sneaking into a dark movie picture house at night as though you were ashamed of the color of her tresses. A red-headed girl, and especially one with character (and girls with character are scarce these days) is a priceless jewel. I would rather see fire on a girl's head and the fires of love, devotion and patriotism in her heart, than fire in the shape of a cigarette between her lips. As long as the young lady suits you and Uncle Charlie, you should not worry what the rest of the gang thinks. If the flame of your affection burns out, Jim, and you can assure me that the young lady is a good cook and as bright of mind as of head, you can send her to me. You say: "What do you think about this love mater?" Mater, Jim, is Latin for mother. Well, I advise you to make love to your mater no matter what may be the color of her hair, for you will always find she is the best sweetheart a boy ever had.

431 E. 82nd St., NEW YORK CITY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

There is only one subject which seems to be stirring most people here as well as in Europe, owing to the great war losses, and that is the immortality of the soul. I have always felt a little interest in the subject and now that I have just lost the greatest gift a woman ever possessed, my husband, naturally I would ask is there any new light on the old subject. Have attended several lectures given in one of the prominent churches here in New York. Discussions being made on the views of various prominent men, such as Maeterlinck, and Sir Oliver Lodge. With so many COMFORT readers, surely there are some of you who can discuss this subject among us. MRS. MARION B. TABOR.

My dear friend, you have my sincere sympathy in the loss of a devoted husband. Tens of thousands who are mourning their dead are yearning to get a word from them, long for "the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." A wave of what was once called spiritualism and is now known as spiritism has swept the world. Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir Conan Doyle and other notable men, have delved into this matter and think they have got into communication with those who have passed beyond. These eminent men have given a certain prestage to a cult that was largely, but not wholly in the hands of frauds and fakers. The methods of communication has been of late chiefly through a contraption called the ouija board. If all I have read, heard and seen in connection with this subject (and I have read a good deal) is correct, spiritism, like a good many other isms including Bolshevism, is something the average person had better leave alone. I know of people who have been mentally unbalanced by trying to delve into the future, and there are others who get a deal of satisfaction and inspiration out of this uncanny "ism." But for heaven's sake what is the use of it all? As good Christians we believe there is a hereafter, that the body is but a tenement of clay and that the soul or spirit lives eternally in a better world. Why worry then? There is a funny side to this otherwise serious and solemn matter. Tens of thousands of war widows who were breaking their hearts over their loved ones and finding the ministration and consolations of the church did not satisfy the aching void sustained by the death of a noble and gallant husband, turned to spiritism, the medium and the ouija board for comfort and relief. Within a year many of these ladies were married again, and they are fervently hoping that no ouija board expert will be able to get a message through to them from departed husband number one in the great beyond. Life is so short, as short as a tramp's working day, that I never could understand (and I have as many dear ones in the spirit world as most people) why so many people want to be continually poking their noses into the next world, lifting up the flap of the business partners and he neither buys nor sells stock without first asking my opinion of the deal. He taught me to handle all important matters. At first I objected because I did not know how. He said I must learn while he was here to teach me so if I should ever be left alone I would not have to learn in, maybe, a mighty hard way.

I'll tell you of my pet economy. Just this, sacks, flour sacks, sugar sacks, gunny sacks and grain sacks. Four large 100-pound size sacks, dyed, make a good dress. Two will make the waist and yoke of skirt and two the bottom of skirt gathered to yoke. Three of the same size make a man's shirt. They also make good face towels. Of course these are the sugar sacks. The gunny or burlap are nice for filling quilts and wash much easier than cotton. I use them for lining pieced wool rugs. The large soft sacks, stenciled, make nice curtains. One may make couch covers of the heavy grain sacks. A stencil helps out wonderfully. I make table covers, underwear and nighties of 'em and there really is no end to the ways they may be used. I make quilts of them and use them for the lining.

Love to all. KANSAS KID.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you admit a lonely little girl into your friendly circle? I wrote once before but was not admitted.

I can sympathize with "Wife in Name Only." Although I am not married I gave up a dear one in the great war and I cannot get over the loss. I try to forget him when out in company but all in vain. The company of other boys does not mean anything to me and I prefer to spend my Sundays and evenings alone, with only his letters to read and cry over. I go car riding once in a while but it seems I must hurry home for he is waiting for me. I have had people say to me, "Why should you worry when he was one of many thousands who were killed over there?" But I can't help longing for him return, though I know it cannot be.

Who will advise me?

SAD LITTLE GIRL.

Sad Little Girl.—There is a beautiful poem written by Lieut. Col. John McRae of Montreal, Canada, which is printed below, and when you read it I want you to give thought to the line, "If ye break faith with us who die," and ask yourself if you are not breaking faith with your sweetheart. There are more ways than one of breaking faith, you know, and if he gave his life to make the world better then surely you can do your share as well, and you can't by sitting down and letting every opportunity to be helpful slip by unheeded. That isn't what he would want you to do. It hurts, I know, but be as brave as he was.

In Flanders Fields

"In Flanders Fields the poppies blow
Between the crosses, row on row
That mark our place; and in the sky
The larks still bravely singing fly,
Scarce heard amid the guns below.

"We are the Dead. Short days ago
We lived, felt dawn, saw sunset glow,
Loved and were loved, and now we lie
In Flanders fields.

"Take up our quarrel with the foe;
To you from falling hands we throw
The torch; be yours to hold it high.
If ye break faith with us who die,
We shall not sleep, though poppies grow
In Flanders fields."

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Use kerosene in carpet sweeper to brighten carpets.

Give your wire clothesline a coat of white enamel and it will wear much longer.

Spread a little flour over the tops of cakes before frosting and the frosting will not run off.

Use a cup of pear or peach preserve juice in making cookies and less sugar will be required.—MRS. W. L. COX, Grapevine, Texas.

Use both parts of your double boiler. By cooking vegetables in lower part, the next morning cereal can be cooked in upper part.

When scaling fish, if you haven't a curry comb for that purpose, use a cookie cutter. It prevents the scales from scattering. Use a pair of scissors for cutting off fins and tail. It is easier than using a knife. —JOSEPHINE MIDBOE, Sibeka, Minn.

Use your sewing machine when a large mending accumulates. Darning is very successfully done on the machine by crossing and recrossing the stitches and runs in stockings look much better when sewed by machine than by hand.—OLD-TIME SUBSCRIBER, Arkansas.

To make a dusty carpet look bright, wring an old sheet out of water and spread smoothly over the carpet. Now beat this with carpet beater as hard as you can and the sheet catches all the dust. Begin in one corner of the room and move the sheet, after rinsing each time, so its edges will lap over the last space.

Hot Weather Hints

MAN, from experience, has come to know just how to clothe, feed and manage himself for comparative comfort during the hot weather months of the year. Modern farms now are coming to be equipped with facilities for bathing in the house, and ice is a common commodity nowadays whereas it was a rarity not many years ago on most farms. But the animals of the farm! What of them? Do we give them the consideration they deserve and try to keep them as comfortable as possible? It must be answered that too often this important matter is overlooked, neglected or never given a thought, and so we may be excused if we give a few hints on the subject here, from a common sense and practical standpoint rather than that of sentiment or theory.

The Farm Work Horse

It does not pay to let a work horse wear a long, coarse coat of hair when he has to work in summer. In some instances, from ill-thrift or ill-health, a horse fails to shed his coat promptly and perfectly in spring. When that occurs, clip the coat at once and the horse will thrive and work far better than when it is left in place.

It is poor policy to let the manure piles stand under the windows and about the doors of the horse stable. Flies galore breed there and torture horses so that they keep thin and give less efficient service in harness. Get the manure out onto the bare-bitten pastures, or top dress with it the plots that are to be plowed for the production of a succession of grazing green stuff for hogs.

Screen the doors and windows of the horse stable and darken it somewhat, in addition to keeping it clean. That will mean no flies or some flies that do not bite, and corresponding comfort for the horse. Put fly nets on the horse or sheet him lightly when at work in hot weather and remember to spray with fly repellent those portions of the body which are not protected otherwise. Shade the head and give the work horse cool water often when at work in the fields.

The work horse will do better on oats and bran than much corn in hot weather, and lush green grass is too loosening and softening for a hard working horse. Let the horse work on "hard feed" until the busy season is over; then he may have a run on grass.

Groom the horse thoroughly once a day; also sponge his eyes and mouth when he comes in hot and tired, and give him a chance to roll, but not where stones and stubs may hurt his back.

Keep the harness clean, dry and smooth and have it fit properly. When possible, remove the harness at noon and sponge the shoulders and neck with cold salty water. Feed only a pound or two of hay at noon while the horse is cooling off; then give water and then grain. If possible, do not work the horse immediately after a meal.

Provide shade and abundant pure water for mares and young stock on grass. It is cruel and hurtful to let a mare and her foal run on an unshaded bare-bitten, waterless pasture; nor should the foal run with the mare when she is at work. Let the work-mare cool off at noon and strip away most of her milk at that time before she is allowed to nurse her foal.

Cattle, Sheep and Swine

Cattle also must have shade and plenty of drinking water to do well, and require salt at least once a week.

When flies are prevalent, it pays to spray dairy cows with an effective fly repellent. At such times, growing calves, unless nursing their dams, are best off in a big, cool, clean, airy pen or boxstall. Keep cows from running into cold water when hot. That is a common cause of mysterious cases of garget. So far as possible, allow a frequent change of pasture.

Keep lambs off old, contaminated, bare-bitten pasture long used by sheep. On such pasture they cannot escape becoming infested with worms. That also is true of the pig and foal. New, fresh grass is best for the young animals. Allow hogs clean bathing water, by preference in a cement tank. Keep them out of old hog wallows and do not let them sleep in dank, dirty places under stables and in old stack bottoms. Cholera lurks there and is sure to kill.

In newly-opened farming districts, try to supply deep well water for horses and other stock, unless pure running or spring water is available. Surface water is dangerous. Swamp fever and hemorrhagic septicemia are most common where it is drank and where animals pasture wild land. Red water in cows also is commonest in such places. Sheep are less commonly affected. Better feed stock in yards and stables on tame feed where such disease, forage poisoning and horse plague are prevalent.

Keep young cattle immunized against blackleg where that disease often occurs, and all animals immunized against hemorrhagic septicemia when that disease is prevalent. Anthrax is most likely to attack cattle on low, wet pastures, just after a heavy rain. Keep them off those pastures at such times and if the disease has been common, have the cattle vaccinated by a graduate veterinarian.

Be careful not to overdrive swine in hot weather. They are easily overcome. If shipped to market, ice the car. Put wet sand on the floor as well, for both swine and cattle. Put a big chunk of ice in the manger for a horse to lick at will, if he is shipped by rail in very hot weather. See that all shipped stock is watered adequately during transit. Don't ship all sorts or ages of stock loose in the same car.

Sanitation of the Farm Home

So much depends on the health of the family that no pains should be spared, or no amount of labor counted too much to guard against disease caused by lack of sanitation in the home and its surroundings.

Typhoid fever, malaria, hookworm, tuberculosis and dysentery can be traced to flies, mosquitoes, ants, cockroaches, bedbugs, fleas and moths—also to those animal pests, rats and mice.

Drinking Water

Be sure the water supply for the house has no contaminated source. A shallow well or spring is very easily filled, during wet seasons, with surface water, and this water may contain filth and germs which menace the health and lives of the family. Deep wells and covered springs and cleanly surroundings are a necessity.

Be sure no water drains into well or spring from the barnyard or the outside toilet. Locate the well a goodly distance from both and on higher ground or where such drainage cannot get into it. If you have a spring, be careful as to the location of your outbuildings in regard to it. Typhoid fever is transmitted through water and food which is fouled by filth that is germ laden.

Screening Windows

Screen all windows and doors against flies and mosquitoes—these are carriers of disease germs. A certain variety of mosquito is a carrier of malaria. If there is any stagnant water on your farm, drain it, as such places are great breeding grounds for mosquitoes. A little kerosene should be placed upon such places as cannot be drained. Burn or bury all decayed vegetable or animal matter. Keep the manure hauled out. Chloride of lime is a good cheap disinfectant to sprinkle over the breeding places of flies.

Outside Toilet

Locate the outside toilet where there is no danger of any drainage toward well or cistern. It should have a deep pit and a pipe leading from the pit to above the roof to carry off foul gases. Keep a goodly supply of chloride of lime handy to sprinkle into the pit as it is an absorber of odors and also a disinfectant. Crude oil is good to put in bottom of pit. Screen both windows and doors of toilet and make the pit tight to keep the flies out as they may carry the germs and filth into the house.

Clean Grounds around House

Keep the grounds raked and all rotting vegetation buried or destroyed. Don't have a heavy shade around house, or too many vines climbing over windows and porches. "Let the sunshine in," the more the better. Sunshine is the best destroyer of germs known. A house hidden in trees is a damp place to live in and it takes days to dry it thoroughly after a heavy rain. Run up the shades—better a faded rug or no rugs at all than sickness in the family. There is no such thing as having too much sunshine.

Grounds not raked afford numberless breeding places for ants and pests that annoy and make unsanitary your home and its surroundings. Cockroaches love damp places.

Care of Garbage

Garbage which cannot be fed to chickens or hogs (we are speaking of kitchen garbage) should be burned or buried. Pails to hold garbage should be tightly covered and kept clean. If the garbage is to be burned, it is a good plan to drain and wrap it in paper. Lining the garbage pail or can with heavy paper keeps the pail clean. Pails for slop should be kept away from the house or in a screened place as they draw the flies.

Rats and Mice

Ceaseless war should be waged on rats and mice. Not only do they carry disease but they destroy property and food. Rats in the barn, and mice in the house are an expensive proposition from a sanitary or economical standpoint. Use traps or any vigorous method, but get rid of them as quickly as possible. Barium carbonate is destructive of them and has the advantage of not being harmful to other animals.

Home and farm sanitation is vital and thorough cleanliness of home grounds and outbuildings of the utmost importance. Take a walk over your farm plant and with critical inspection pick out the things you can do to make your home a safe place in which to live.

Don't lay the taking away of some loved one to an All Wise Providence when it may be only the result of criminal neglect of proper drainage—adequate screening, destroying of decaying animal and vegetable matter—or the letting in of fresh air and sunshine.

Work with Nature and she is your best friend but disobey her laws and sure punishment follows.

Is Your Spraying Outfit Ready?

The days of pests are here—bugs and blight, worms and weeds, rusts and ruin—and come with a flood in hot weather. The only safe way—and sometimes not then—is to have your spraying outfits ready, materials all at hand, to be used at a moment's notice. Just a few days' neglect of the potato bugs and the potatoes are ruined. Puf off looking after the currant worms for 24 hours and the damage is done. Neglect the cabbage worm for a few days and "good by," cabbage. Or give potato blight a day's start in favorable weather and you'll never catch up with it.

WHAT TO HAVE READY.—The first thing to get on the job is a good spraying machine. This will cost anywhere from fifteen to forty dollars or more, depending on size. The essential thing is not the price but the pressure. No sprayer that does not deliver a pressure of at least a hundred pounds is effective. Power sprayers are stronger and better but cost more. But strong pressure itself is not sufficient. The other necessity is a good nozzle. The double or triple spray nozzle of the Velmorel type is the best to use. Aside from the spraying machine, one should keep at hand ready for quick use the necessary sprays.

WHAT SPRAYS TO GET.—For general use there is nothing better than arsenate of lead or arsenate of zinc, both of which come in the form of white powder or paste. Both mix well in water, stick well to foliage and have the advantage of leaving a clearly defined trail behind. These poisons can be used for all chewing insects except the currant and cabbage worms; they are especially fine for potato bugs and other leaf-eating insects.

For currant worms, white hellebore is highly recommended. It is said that strong salt water makes a good spray for cabbage worms, though arsenate of lead is all right if the cabbages have not begun to head.

For plant lice of all kinds there is nothing better than nicotine poisons, such as "Black Leaf 40."

For plant diseases, two standard sprays are available in prepared form ready for mixing. Lime Sulphur for orchards and Bordeaux mixture for potato blight. These should always be kept on hand where they can be mixed and applied on short notice.

Insects to Spray For

SCALE INSECTS.—All scale insects, like oyster shell bark louse, San Jose scale and cotton scale, can be controlled if taken in time—that is, in early spring or late winter before the buds begin to shoot. A strength of solution sufficient to kill the insects would also kill the foliage if applied at any time other than during the dormant period. It is now too late to spray for scale insects. Next winter use concentrated lime sulphur for this purpose.

LEAF EATERS.—The principal leaf-eating insects attacking fruit and vegetables are the canker worm, the coddling moth, the tent caterpillar, the plum curculio, the shot hole borer, the cabbage worm and the cucumber beetle. All these may be controlled with the lead arsenate spray prepared as follows: One pound of powdered lead arsenate or two pounds of the paste mixed thoroughly with 40 gallons of water. If smaller quantities are desired, mix in the same proportions.

SAP SUCKERS.—The principal sap suckers are the various kinds of lice and bugs such as squash bugs, the "calico bug," and the little green lice that affect rose bushes, currants and house plants. The lice can be killed by using a tobacco spray but the bugs must either be hand picked or destroyed by use of a trap crop as described in another place.

More details may be found in circulars No. 109 and No. 110 recently published by the agricultural college at Stillwater, Oklahoma.

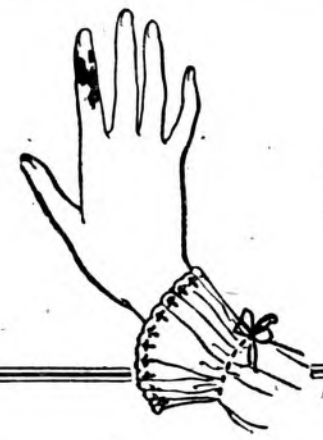
A New Cabbage Bug

There is a new cabbage pest that during the past few years has increased in numbers and invaded the country from the south. It has been a source of trouble in the south for years but has appeared as far north as New Jersey and Ohio and threatened to invade New England. It is commonly known as the "fire bug" or the "calico bug" from its red, yellow and black coloring. It is about a half-inch in length and sucks the cap of plants but does not eat the leaves as does the ordinary cabbage worm.

WHAT THE EGGS LOOK LIKE.—The egg masses of this bug look like tiny white barrels with black hoops and a black spot where the bunghole ought to be. These peculiar little "barrels" are a sure means of identifying the eggs, and hence the bugs. The eggs are found on the under side of the leaf and the young bugs are shaped like mud-turtles. The bug is distributed all over the United States except those lying along the Canadian border.

PLANTS THE BUGS ATTACK.—Beside cabbage plants, "calico bugs" attack kale, cauliflower, kohlrabi, Brussels sprouts, turnips, radishes, horseradish, mustard rape and like plants, and when these have been destroyed they move on to potatoes, tomatoes, beans, beets and egg plants. They are very destructive bugs and hard to get at. They do their injury by sucking the sap. They cannot be controlled, like chewing insects, by the use of poison spray.

How to Control These Bugs



The best method of control is by the use of "trap" crops. These are planted early and attacked by the first or parent brood of bugs. The plants are then sprayed with kerosene, which kills both plant and bugs. Or they may be collected by hand. The first brood destroyed, of course the second never appears. Early horseradish always attracts these bugs. From these plants the bugs should be picked off and destroyed. Another method is to go over the field with a hand torch. A skilled worker can kill the bugs with the torch without doing injury to the plants as an instant's contact is sufficient.

Persons who have trouble with this pest should write the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture for Farmer's Bulletin No. 1061 on "Cabbage Bug Control."

Keep Planting and Cultivating

If you have a limited garden space, keep it busy. As fast as one crop is harvested plant something else that will mature before frost

A mere touch will end it—

So with corns

A spot on your hand is ended with a touch of soap. You don't cover it and keep it.

A touch of Blue-jay ends a corn, as easily and surely. Then why pare and coddle corns, and let them stay for years?

Millions of people nowadays end all corns in this way:

They drop on liquid Blue-jay or apply a Blue-jay plaster.

The ache stops. The toe from that moment is comfortable. And shortly tne entire corn loosens and comes out.

The method was perfected in this world-famed laboratory. It is gentle, scientific, sure. It is now the recognized, the model way of dealing with a corn.

It means to those who know it a lifetime without corns.

It you let corns spoil happy hours, you should learn the folly of it. Try Blue-jay tonight. Your druggist sells it.

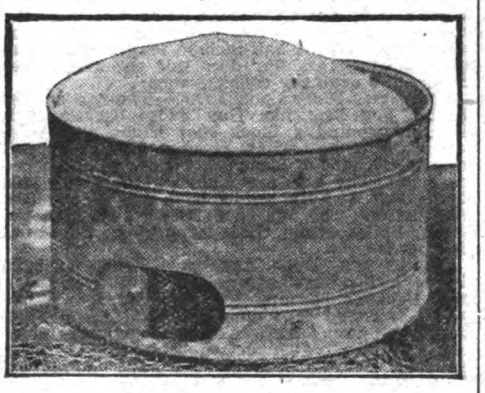
About Yarding Fowls

IT is difficult to make farm people understand that fowls are better off kept in yards; in fact, that they must be so restrained if the highest egg records are to be reached. In way back times, it was considered a detriment to yard fowls, but for some years past professional poultry keepers have yarded their fowls, because they found it was the only way to reach the top notch. Even now, the general farmers cling to the free range idea, and I am convinced that it is not purely because they consider it necessary, but it saves feed and other bother. It has been estimated that a flock of common hens, such as are seen on the average farm, lay in a year less than a hundred eggs each. The figures are eighty to ninety. Farmers who have become breeders, and who thus give the hen decidedly more consideration, and still adhere to the free range system, have increased this yield to one hundred and fifty and better. Breeders who are following the strictly up-to-date methods and have yarded their layers, have obtained an average of one hundred and seventy-five eggs, and some have even reached the two hundred mark.



Please note that I say fowls or hens, and I do not mean this to include growing chicks. The line must be distinctly drawn between the two. The range cannot be too extended for growing stock. What we strive for in growing stock is frame, on which later we intend to put flesh. This frame can only be built by food, and plenty of it, converted into bone and muscle by exercise. After the chick has made the frame, we can safely yard her and put on the flesh, and thus convert her into a money-earning machine.

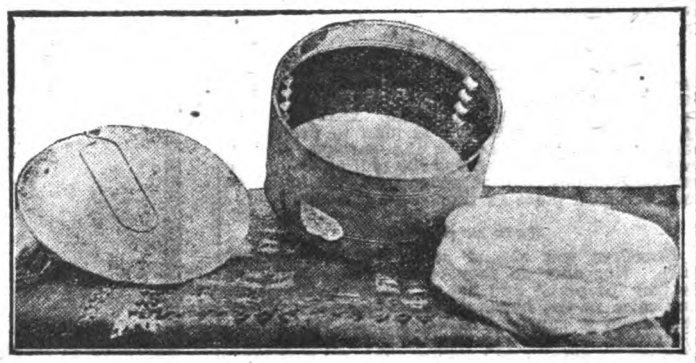
The advantages gained by yarding stock are manifold. First of all, by confining stock to a certain space, we are sure they eat the food provided, and in the quantity we mean them to have. Feeding layers to produce eggs is becoming every year a more delicate operation. Formula after formula is tried by different breeders as an experiment, with the hope of increasing the egg yield. If we can force each hen to lay ten eggs a year more, it means a considerable increase in the total of the flock, and a better return in dollars and cents to the breeder. Yarding stock is a means to this end. The food fed is converted, as we mean it to be, into eggs, and not into muscle. It is decidedly more troublesome to care for stock in this way, and necessitates more labor and expense, but we are looking for the increase all the time, and are thus continually hoping to be compensated for the extra trouble.

Fowls in yards must be supplied with everything they require, which means all they would naturally seek when running at large. This includes, besides the grain we feed by formula, green food, meat, a scratching place, and dusting spot, and grit and water. Of all these I consider green food the most necessary, and the one thing to be impressed upon the mind, because it is the one thing too often forgotten. The ideal yarding of fowls is what is called double yarding—that is, a house in the middle and a yard on each side. These yards can be sown with rye or oats, and alternated so that the fowls will have a constant green run as long as the rye or oats will grow, which is until frost. Failing the double yard system, green food may be supplied by lawn clippings, whole cabbage, mangel-wurzels, turnips, or any vegetable.

Meat can be fed in a variety of ways. Turning up the ground of the yards with a cultivator, or by shallow plowing, will bring the worms and bugs within reach, or sheep heads cut open and fed raw can be thrown in, and this is an ideal meat feed. Ground beef scraps softened may be mixed in mash—and last, and probably the best—cut green bone.

Yarded fowls need exercise. It must not be understood that because they are confined they do not get exercise, or as much as if let run at large. The yards should be at least one hundred and fifty feet long, if they are the width of the average coop, which is ten by twelve feet.

THIS IS A METAL FIRELESS BROODER BUT IT SHOWS VERY PLAINLY HOW TO CONVERT A BUTTER TUB INTO A COZY SLEEPING PLACE FOR BABY CHICKS.



Some breeds are decidedly more active by nature than others; for instance, the Leghorns as compared with the Cochins or Brahmas. This does not affect the health of the birds particularly. A Leghorn is no healthier because of her activity than a Cochin is. It is simply the difference in their natures, but because of this excess of activity of one breed over another, the one must have more room than the other. The Leghorn stands the confinement of a coop ten by twelve feet in winter, provided she can be kept actively hunting for her food; but the same bird would mope and become out of condition if confined too long in an exhibition coop in a show-room. On the other hand, the Cochin, being of a lazier nature, forages slowly, and wanders quietly over her yard, takes things easy in her winter coop, and stands the confinement of the exhibition coop excellently.

The foraging nature of any breed can be killed by excessive feeding. Even birds with free range, if overfed at special meal hours, will take but limited exercise, exactly as those treated the same and yarded. Exercise is induced by short feeding. In other words, no laying strain should be fed all they can eat except at night. Hunger induces exercise, whether a fowl be let run or yarded. Therefore, fowls fed short and induced to run for more, will lay eggs, while those overfed, in the morning especially, will sit around moping in the sun, and convert the food into flesh instead of eggs.

Another advantage of yarding fowls is the certainty of finding all the eggs laid during the day, and then being able to guarantee them as strictly fresh. This is a point of great importance, and constitutes the difference between eggs produced by an up-to-date breeder with yarded fowls, and those sold by the "honest" farmer who collects them every day, and cannot swear that they were laid today—not two weeks ago.

It is strange that few people except the real poultry farmers realize that July is one of the most important months in the year. The desire to have eggs in zero weather invariably compels good attention to hens in the winter. Baby chicks arouse interest in the spring, but as the weather gets warmer, eggs are plentiful, and the pretty fluffy babies, developed into long, lanky creatures, seem nothing but a nuisance specially ordained to destroy the garden, so the poor things are shut up in small quarters, and woefully neglected. During the fall and winter I am repeatedly asked how to make pullets and hens lay, but I can rarely suggest a remedy, because nine times out of ten it is the result of blunders made the preceding summer.

If poultry is to be profitable, the old and young stock must have been kept apart, because it is impossible to feed correctly when they are all together. Young birds need plenty of nutritious food to push them along quickly, and laying hens must be put on special rations to bring about early moulting, which is the foundation of a good supply of winter eggs.

THE PILLOW IS MUCH BETTER THAN LEAVING THE COTTON AND EXCELSIOR LOOSE. NOTE CLEATS FOR FRAME TO REST ON.

Moulting

About July 5th commence to cut down the feed gradually, until at the end of two weeks forty hens are having a pint of oats and a pint of wheat mixed, night and morning. Scatter it amongst cut straw or some litter, so they will have to scratch for every grain. The first of August, commence to increase the rations, and keep it up for a week, so that by the fifteenth they are getting two quarts of mash in the morning, a quart of meat scraps and a pint of cracked corn at noon—and wheat and oats or barley at night. Give them just about all they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. The morning mash should be composed of two parts ground feed (corn or oats), one part white middlings and one part oilmeal mixed with scalding milk or water. The semi-starvation followed by the heavy feed forces the moulting season and allows plenty of time to get in condition before October, when their rations should be made up of the essentials for egg production, which are clover hay, bran, wheat, corn and animal food.

You see, it takes about three months for hens to get rid of their old feathers and put on a new coat, and if the process is not forced in some way, they will not commence before August, which would make it October before they finished. Of course, that would be time enough if it happened to be a warm, late fall, but if cold weather sets in, as it often does in November, hens would not lay before spring, as moulting leaves them in more or less of a debilitated condition.

Lots of people make the mistake of selling off hens as soon as they cease laying at this season, which means that they are usually parting with the birds that would make the real winter layers. Hens that lay through the summer and do not cease until the fall will be idle and unprofitable in the winter. It is the general disregard of the moulting period which causes so many failures in the winter supply of eggs. The rule should be to sell off all the hens that have been laying steadily through the summer and commenced to shed feathers in September. Growing feathers is a trying ordeal, and the consequence is that when the hen begins to moult she ceases to lay, for she cannot produce eggs and feathers at the same time.

Feathers are largely composed of nitrogen and mineral matter. That is why the food at moulting time has to be so very nutritious. To feed nothing but corn at such a time is simply waste, as the hen cannot produce new feathers on such a diet. If she is on free range she would have a better chance of gathering the necessary material, but, even then, if the feathering process is delayed too long, the hen becomes exhausted, and is susceptible to cold and all sorts of diseases. This is the real reason why roup and swelled heads are so prevalent in the fall.

Young birds hatched out in April or thereabouts, usually commence to lay in November, because they have not been subject to the drain upon the constitution caused by moulting. But chickens that have been hatched in February or early March are very liable to moult in the late fall, just when they should be commencing to lay. For this reason it is well to market all the first-hatched chickens, and hold over those hatched late in March or through April, to increase the laying flock.

Cull all young stock down closely. Don't keep a lot of young cockerels to eat up all the profits. Even pullets which are at all backward should be marketed, for they won't develop after cold weather sets in, and it does not pay to keep them for summer layers. Most of the failures made in the poultry business are due to people not having the courage to clean out unproductive birds. Just calculate how many quarts of feed ten growing birds will eat in seven months, and I think you will be convinced that it is unfair to expect the flock to support them and still show a profit. The trouble is that people don't realize that young stock stands still as soon as cold weather starts, remaining almost stationary until spring. Another evil of keeping undeveloped stock is that they occupy house room and crowd the older birds.

C. G.—I think you will have better success another year if you will feed the regular commercial chick food, which is a mixture of cracked grains and small seeds. Give it to them four or five times a day for the first two weeks; then keep a self-feeding hopper always before them, filled with what is known as developing mash, and give the chick food as an extra night and morning. If you have any special difficulty in getting these specially made-up foods, prepare them yourself. Take equal quantities of cracked corn, wheat and hulled oats. Crack them much finer than ordinary cracked corn, and then pass them through a sieve which will allow nothing larger than mustard seed to pass through the mesh. Crack charcoal, and sieve in the same way, then add white mustard seed and golden millet. For the dry mash to be used in the hopper, mix equal quantities of any good grade of stock or horse feed bran, and half the quantity of bone or beef meal for the first month, after which you can increase the bone or beef until you are giving an equal quantity. If the chicks have a warm brooder to run into, they can be out from the first day if the weather is not too cold, but they should have a brooder which registers ninety degrees the first week, eighty the second, and from then on until they are a month old, seventy-five. Later in the spring the temperature under the hover need not be so high after the first week.

D. M. P.—The first requisite is a box two feet square and seven inches deep, with a lid at least five inches deep. Or if you can get two strong boxes the same size, which are six or seven inches deep, take off the lids, and use one of the bottoms for a lid. Personally, I prefer to use a lard or butter tub. Put two hinges at the back, and a hook and eye in front. Cut a hole three inches square in the center of the front, for the chickens to run in and out of. At both ends of the lid, or top box, make half-inch holes three inches apart and an inch from the top. This completes the outside of the brooder. Put cleats in each corner of the top and bottom boxes, two inches from the top. Then make a frame to fit inside the box and rest upon the cleats; cover it with burlap. At first, put the frame onto the cleats in the lower part of the brooder, with the fringed material hanging down, to make a comfortable covering for the chicks. After the babies are about two weeks old, the frame must be put onto the frame in the top part of the box, which will lift the material about three inches from the floor of the brooder. At first, when the screen is in the lower half of the brooder, fold a piece of cotton-batting and fit carefully over it, filling in the entire space to the edge of the box. In the top half put a layer of excelsior about an inch and a half deep, then fill in with cotton-batting to the edge. The burlap on the frame being porous, and the cotton batting ditto, allows a perfect system of ventilation from the front opening to the top part of the brooder. Of course, when the frame is moved to the top part of the brooder, some of the cotton-batting has to be removed, but by that time the chicks have grown considerably, and furnish a great deal more animal heat than they did at first. As I have received three other requests for making fireless brooders, I am republishing pictures which show construction. After the babies are about four weeks old, it is well to take out the frame with the fringed woolen material attached, and use another frame covered with burlap, which is to keep the cotton-batting in place.

H. W.—I think the roosters must have rheumatism. Is the chicken house damp? Look for cracks and poor drainage. Perhaps the house is too close when shut up at night. The poultry house must be well ventilated. Fresh air never hurts birds, it is only damp and draughts that are dangerous. Better take out a window and cover the opening with muslin. If any more birds are attacked, rub the feet and shanks with equal parts of oil and turpentine well mixed. Want of vegetable food during the winter is apt to cause rheumatism.

That Bad Headache

By H. M. Smith, M. D.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

NINE tenths of the headaches that we all suffer from once in a while come from some derangement of the stomach, for headache is not a disease in itself but only a symptom, a sort of cry for help from certain parts of the body that need attention. So do not fly for headache powders or tablets, most of which contain some of the coal-tar preparations that are so injurious to the heart, and which should only be taken under a physician's orders; but try to get at the real source of the trouble.

If you wake with a dull headache every morning that either wears off or gets worse late in the day, you can be certain that there is either something wrong with your digestion or that your liver is sluggish. Take, on arising, a glass of vichy with the juice of an orange squeezed in it, or, if more convenient, a cup of very hot water with the juice of half a lemon. Then half an hour afterward take a cup of black coffee—coffee without milk or sugar. Very often this will entirely cure the pain while if you diluted it with milk and sugar it would have little effect. Then eat a light breakfast, a soft-boiled egg with perhaps a slice of toast or some whole-wheat bread, some cereal and milk will be enough. Be careful of your diet throughout the day and at night take a dose of castor oil and you should wake up without a trace of headache the next morning.

If you have a regular sick headache accompanied with nausea, the best remedy is hot salt water. Put half a teaspoonful of salt in a glass of warm water and drink as many glasses of this as is necessary to act as a thorough emetic. Then lie down for an hour in a quiet, well-ventilated room with a cloth wet with witch-hazel across the eyes. At the end of that time if the headache is not greatly relieved, take a high enema of a quart of warm water with a tablespoonful of salt in it. Then lie down again and after a little while take a cup of black coffee or a cup of tea if you prefer it, but don't take any solid food until you feel entirely well again. Such headaches can be kept away by a careful diet of plenty of fruit and green vegetables, meat only once a day and not much of that and plenty of water to drink, cutting out rich cake, pastry and much candy for a while. Often foods containing bran, bran bread or muffins or cereal or two tablespoonfuls of sterilized bran once a day will help wonderfully in keeping away headaches.

Sometimes the headache comes from an entirely different cause, which is lack of nourishment. Perhaps you have been working long past your usual lunch or dinner hour and begin to feel as if you never wanted any more food. You have a pain in the back of your neck and perhaps across the top of your head as well. What you need is light, nourishing food and a little rest. Take a cup of hot tea or coffee and some easily digested food and you will certainly feel better. If the pain in the back of the neck continues, lean your head back in an easy-chair and put a hot water bag under the head at the back of the neck. If you are where it is impossible to do this, rub it with a strong pencil.

Automobile and Gas Engine Helps

Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Air Cooling

IN a previous issue it was explained that due to the intense heat generated by the expanded gases in the cylinders, it was necessary to provide means for cooling the cylinder walls, otherwise they would become red hot. There are two mediums used on present-day cars for the cooling of the engine: water and air. The former is often referred to as the indirect method and the latter as the direct method. This is due to the fact that the water which cools the cylinder walls must in turn be cooled by air. There appears to be a general opinion, which is hard to dispel, that an air-cooled motor is satisfactory in cold climates but inefficient in hot climates. Much to the contrary, an air-cooled motor may succeed in hot climates where a water-cooled engine will fail. We might go on to great length and present arguments for the air-cooled motor but, since our intent is to describe the method, we will adhere strictly to the subject.

To obtain the best results from air cooling, the cylinder must present the largest surface possible to the air current. This is accomplished in several ways. Nearly everyone who was interested in automobiles eight or ten years ago will recall the engines which appeared on the market with cylinders having an outward appearance of a porcupine. We refer to the pins which were screwed into the cylinder. The principle involved was that the heat would run to the pins and be carried off by the current of air. The cylinders of other air-cooled engines had flanges, some running around the circumference while others ran lengthwise of the cylinder walls. From the above it will be clear that the idea was to present as large a surface as possible to the current of air. As might be expected, the air was forced by a fan to the exposed surfaces. Some used a large fan in front of the motor while others made use of the flywheel by placing the flywheel spokes at an angle and thereby forming a fan.

The latest development in air cooling harnesses the air current in such a manner as to compel it to come into contact with the hot cylinder walls. One of the best known air-cooled cars on the market at the present time employs this system. On this particular motor, each cylinder is provided with fifty-two steel flanges which extend almost for the entire length of the cylinder wall. Surrounding these flanges on each cylinder is an aluminum sleeve. A sheet-metal deck connects with the aluminum sleeves in such a manner as to form two compartments under the hood which are approximately air tight. The fan is formed in the flywheel, and the action is as follows: Since the two compartments are approximately air tight, the suction created by the flywheel draws the air through the opening cut in the front of the hood, down through the aluminum jackets around the cylinders and in direct contact with the cylinder flanges. The air is then carried through the flywheel and expelled into the atmosphere. Due to the fact that the hood plays an important part in making the two chambers air tight, it will be understood that when the hood is raised the suction created by the flywheel will cease to exist. For this reason, the engine should not be run for more than a few minutes at a time with the hood raised.

The Country School

"OVER 6,000 FAIL TO PASS EXAMINATIONS—Many Rural School Children of 13 Counties Fail in Eighth Grade Examinations," is the startling announcement appearing in an edition of a daily newspaper published in a city of middle Michigan. Mr. W. W. McLain, commissioner of Jackson county schools, has the following to say on the subject:

"The rural schools fell 22 per cent below the cities and villages in the number of their eighth grade promotions. This means that over 6,000 rural boys and girls failed to finish the eighth grade, while they would have accomplished this if they had had the advantages of a good village or city school. How many more thousands of pupils below the eighth grade suffered in like manner?"

Quite frequently the average country school is referred to as the "five and ten cent store of learning." This title is applied for the reason that the pupil gets a little of everything under one cover and not a thorough training in any one thing. First, it cannot be denied that teachers are underpaid. The cities offer the biggest inducement as regards living conditions and salaries, and, therefore, the teachers attracted to the country are usually beginners who go there for the experience or those who could not make good in the cities. In other words, the average teacher of the country school cannot be considered on the same level as the average teacher of the city school. There are a few excellent teachers to be found in the country schools but usually they cannot get results for reasons we will outline below. Consider the school building. It usually consists of a single room and all classes from the first to the graduating meet there. The teacher must hear all these classes in their turn and, therefore, the recitations must be brief. Another disadvantage under which a country school pupil must labor is that he must study in the same room where recitations are being held. In but few words, the school work of the average school pupil is dull and uninteresting and he must be exceptionally bright to make satisfactory progress.

The consolidated country school, made possible by truck and passenger car, looms up as the solution of the problem to bring about better conditions. The consolidated country school is not merely a dream. It is in force in different sections of the country. It gives the country pupil the same advantages enjoyed by the city folks. The school has separate rooms for the different grades, sanitation is good, the classes larger and the teachers are specialists. Usually where the consolidated school plan is in vogue, a fast truck is purchased and equipped with a bus body. Someone can be hired to drive the truck and pick up the pupils along the route. Many farmers own passenger cars and trucks and would be only too glad to drive their children to the school, realizing that their children will receive an education equivalent to that obtained in the cities. A plan of this kind is well worth consideration and development in country districts as it makes the consolidated school a community center, places the country boy on the same footing as regards education with the city boy and creates a better spirit as more people become acquainted, permitting an exchange of ideas and compelling the spirit of cooperation to be felt.

Questions Answered

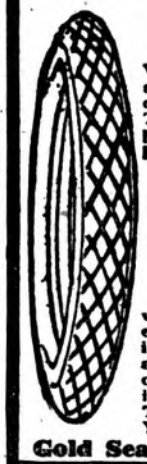
MRS. V. S., Cambridge, Md.—A safety fuse is nothing more or less than a strip of lead wire placed in the electrical circuit for the protection of the wiring, instruments, etc. The circuit is constructed for the passage of current of predetermined power and if for some reason this current should rise in power it would melt the lead strip. You will appreciate that this current would have injured other parts of the system had not the lead strip melted and thereby broken the electrical circuit. You should never substitute any other kind of wire for the fuse, and be certain to use fuse wire of the amperage recommended by the car manufacturer. Should you replace a fuse and it should burn out shortly after installation, the wiring of the car should be carefully examined for worn insulation, grounded wires, etc.

MRS. E. G., Bonners Ferry, Idaho.—The writer has never heard of anyone peening a finished piston to cure piston slap. It may be that some one has found a method which is successful but the writer has always recommended oversized pistons or regrinding as the cure for piston slapping. Due to the number of years which your car has been in service, believe it would be advisable to determine the condition of the cylinder bores. It may be just possible that the bores have worn oval shape, and if such is the case the use of oversized pistons would afford no relief from the present trouble. The remedy would be to have the cylinders reground and oversize pistons properly fitted. Regarding the sketch, would advise that the condition you have portrayed could cause loss of compression. The rings must fit the piston grooves, otherwise the compression will work by.

MRS. A. K., Salem, Ore.—The steam engine for automobile use affords silent operation, power, speed and perfect control of the car without jerky action. These qualities have made it a favorite with many. However, this engine has its objection which, in the writer's estimation, makes it inferior to the gas engine. The source of power is the boiler. To generate steam, there must be a fire. If the fire is allowed to go out, there is a period of waiting while steam is being generated before the car can be used. When the gasoline motor is stopped, the expense and care ceases, so to speak. The car can stand for hours or days and all that is needed is the turning of the motor with the ignition switched on to bring it to life ready for action. If it were not for a few objections, both the steam and electric power plants would prove more ideal for automobile use. There can be no doubting that the steam automobile is a success for those who desire this type of car. The writer is of the opinion that the Stanley Motor Carriage Co., Newton, Mass., manufacture a steam car.

MRS. R. R., Manton, Mich.—We could write a chapter on battery construction, care, etc. If your battery has a leaky cell, you will require a new jar. We would assume from your letter that you have had no experience in battery repairing and, if such is the case, would strongly recommend that you accept our advice and have the work done by someone who specializes in this class of work. There are several books published relative to electrical equipment and by purchasing a book of this nature you will be certain to find a portion of it allotted to storage batteries.

Where Children Are Too Opulent



Washington's child labor problem is rather unusual—it is not a problem of underpaid and poorly fed children toiling in factories, but of well-fed and over-paid boys and girls doing light work. They have plenty of money, and the problem is therefore to prevent them from spending it foolishly or in ways that will injure them.

To some extent the problem is not peculiar to Washington, for almost everywhere boys and girls are able to make more money than they have ever made before. But in Washington the jobs are for messenger service or light clerical work for the Government, and the young people do not realize how much they are getting for the work they do.

At the recommendation of a sub-committee for the children's year campaign, it is possible that a juvenile police force may be established to aid in the supervision of these boys and girls who are receiving pay that ordinarily men are glad to get.—U. S. Dept. of Labor.

with NN'ER ARMOR TIRES

A written guarantee bond for 5,000 miles of satisfactory service is furnished with every order. We have perfected a simple way to manufacture these NN'ER ARMOR TIRES. Everybody knows that FULL VALUE that goes into any article manufactured is put in where THEY ARE MADE. When a tire passes from the factory to the jobber, and then through the dealer and there is a large overhead expense added for national advertising, the price is double or more than the actual value of the tire. The middlemen do not add one red cent's worth of value to any tire. All they add is profits and expense.

NN'ER ARMOR TIRES are Puncture Proof, prevent blowouts and are powerfully built for rough usage, and best of all, they are sold direct to you. Not through dealers.

NN'ER ARMOR TIRES give you your money's worth in the largest sense of the word. You cannot find another tire that possesses all these features at the prices listed below. Don't deprive yourself of the economy and safety gained by the use of NN'ER ARMOR TIRES. Over a hundred thousand satisfied users. Order a complete set today.

JUNE hasn't the monopoly on "perfect days" that is generally accredited to it and there are many perfect days in the life of the average young girl, such as write to me, but investigation reveals the fact that this is made possible by Mother. Now girls, don't you think it is time you gave her a few good days? She works much harder than you realize, so why not give her a vacation? A week or two, if possible, but if that is out of the question try doing the work for a day or two each week and giving her a chance to visit or just rest. Suggest it to her and see how pleased she will be. Then write and tell me all about it. Now that I've gotten that off my mind, I'll answer some S. O. S. calls. The first is from

W. W., Utah.—Why be so wasteful of your hair as to give it away to a boy even if he gives you a lock of his in return? When you are older and your hair is so thin that you have to shingle the bald places with what is left, you'll wish you had it back again. Of course if he could wear it, it would be a different proposition, but scalp locks went out of fashion years ago and were never very popular anyway except among the Indians. People nowadays aren't as sentimental as they used to be. (2) You must be a very kind-hearted girl. First you want to give your hair away and then you say you go to dances alone but always go home with a boy. I hope you are kind and considerate of him. In my days the boys used to call for a girl and take her to a dance and then take her home, and if a girl wasn't good enough for a boy to take to a dance she didn't let him take her home. How times have changed!

E. P., North Carolina.—Wait at least three years before getting married. Would I be insulted if a boy brought me several eggs at Easter? Would I? I should say not! I'd throw my arms around him in joy—first removing the eggs to a place of safety—and invite him to come again. Eggs cost a lot of money nowadays. Didn't you know that eggs and Easter just naturally belong together just the same as Fourth of July and firecrackers or corn beef and cabbage?

A. J., Wisconsin.—"Is a girl of sixteen allowed to kiss a boy when he is taking her home?" If he objects and begs her not to, it would be very unladylike for her to insist and kiss him by force and I hope none of my girls would be so rude. Neither should girls of sixteen, or even older, let boys kiss them. (2) If you don't like a certain boy and don't like to dance with him you have a perfect right to refuse. After several refusals he will begin to understand that maybe you don't care to dance with him and will stop asking you.

N. L. T., Okla.—Do I think if a man really loves a girl he will get angry or peeved at her? That depends upon how aggravating she has been. What have you been doing now? If you were wrong, be a good sport and admit it, and if he is of the right sort he will forgive you and forget it and you'll be happy ever after. Sounds good, doesn't it?

MARY, Mabe, Va.—Don't become despondent, Mary, just because you have never yet seen a man you could love. Sixteen isn't such an advanced age and your eyesight should be keen for some years to come. What's to prevent you taking a "complete course in music" and marrying later? Music and matrimony are good mixers, particularly if the course in music is supplemented by a course in cooking and housekeeping. "Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast," but so have good biscuit and pies and roast beef.

LAURIS, Ore.—Shake hands with your right hand, even if you are left handed. (2) "In your teens" might mean thirteen or nineteen and is too indefinite for me to answer your questions. (3) Ask Katherine Booth about the freckles and sallow skin.

DOROTHY AND MARGARET, Oregon.—Little girls of fourteen shouldn't go to dances, even with nice boys.

ARKANSAS BLONDE, Ark.—If you marry a young man who has a mother and six young brothers and sisters to support and agree to keep your marriage a secret until he is able to care for you, you'll have to be able to keep a secret longer than the average girl can. Don't do it. Why not find a good husband for mother and then your sweetheart would be free to marry you? Isn't that a clever idea? That's all right, I don't want any money for it.

ROSALIE, California.—Rest and quiet and good food are what you need, not forgetting plenty of sleep. Girls of sixteen shouldn't be troubled with "nerves." If your summer vacation doesn't make you feel better, have your mother take you to a good physician.

TWO MOUNTAINEERS FROM ARK.—The proper way for a young man to meet a girl is to ask some mutual friend to introduce him. That shows more respect for her than picking her up. (2) Your mother is right, as mothers have a habit of being. (3) If there was something in the second letter that required an answer it was perfectly proper to write again. There is a chance that he meant it only as a polite acknowledgment of the snapshots. Don't be too eager to write, unless he is more eager.

TED, Okla.—The only way I know for a nice girl to turn a young man against a girl who isn't nice is to refuse to be friendly with him until he gives up the other girl. If he loved you very dearly, as you wish him to, he wouldn't pay her any attentions at all, or, at least, he shouldn't.

MOLLY, Ky.—As I have said many times before, girls of fourteen shouldn't go to dances. Never mind what other girls tell you, your mother knows best. This applies to your chum and all other girls.

DOROTHY, Iowa.—You say you are in love with a rich widower of 45 who has three children but that your parents object to him, and further state that "he is a nice looking man for his age." That's just the trouble, his age. No girl of "about sixteen," which probably means fifteen years and three months, should marry at all and certainly not a man so many years her senior. Tell your chum to keep right on being bashful if it keeps her from letting the boys kiss her.

H. and R., Idaho.—Just listen to this! "How would you answer a question that requires an immediate answer which you are not sure of?" I'll give up. How would you? (2) A bride's trousseau consists of her personal effects, such as dresses, hats, underwear and jewelry. Don't be too extravagant.

SCHOOLGIRL, Ga.—Aren't you the inquisitive thing? My address is in the paper—Cousin Marion, Care COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. And I'm a woman, not a man as you seem to think. How could you doubt me so? I don't know what you mean by "subscribe yourself," but suppose you mean "describe." Never! If I did you'd be so jealous of my beauty that you'd never write to me again and then I'd feel just terribly. When little girls of twelve write me about their many sweethearts it affords me a good laugh and I like to laugh for I'm rather a jolly old maid—perhaps that's why I'm jolly.

P. S. I forgot to say that if you find you need any help in the housekeeping or cooking problem I'd be glad to come to the rescue. I can cook better than I can give advice.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

Through the columns of this department free information pertaining to Etiquette, Personal Appearance and kindred subjects will be given in answer to questions by our subscribers, but not more than two questions the same month by any one subscriber. Address Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and give your own full name and address. Name will not be published.

COUNTRIE GREENIE, Little Orleans, Md.—On a trip on an excursion steamer you should be dressed simply—in a "vacation" way and with no attempt at anything "dressy" or elaborate. From the outfit you list, we would choose either the tan linen suit or the white skirt and a suitable white blouse. Your hat should be simple and close fitting—and if not of this nature it should be preferably removed, as the breezes of the bay will make any large hat a difficult fixture. You should take some sort of a wrap, and a silk or wool sweater would be suitable for this. (2) If you are visiting in a home near this park, it would be quite correct for you to go there without a hat during summer evenings. There was nothing incorrect in your costume of last summer which you mention, and it was well for you to have a wrap along with you for the later cool night air.

CURLS, Va.—The proper phrase would be: "A few are there, but there are not many." (2) Yes; when you are talking with two persons it is necessary that you should look at them both—if your remarks are addressed to both. When you are saying something to only one of your trio, it is a different matter.

C. M. N., Rockland, Me.—In reply to this young man who introduced himself to you at the dance, you could say, "I am Miss Blank," and then if you have any friends that know him you can talk about these things—or about the dance. But it is much better to have somebody present a young man to you, than that he should introduce himself—and the young man should have tried to have had the introduction accomplished in this manner.

A COMFORT FRIEND, Salina, Pa.—It was best that you refused this young man as you did, and it would have been easy for you to thank him and say that you had come to the dance with your parents and they would look out for you on the way home. He could not consider an answer of this kind as discourteous or unpleasant, and it is the sensible and expected reply from a fourteen-year-old schoolgirl. Your letter was well written and expressed good common sense.

L. C., Hamilton, Tex.—Of course you must not promise to marry a man who is now married to a wife he says he does not love—no matter how much he cries over the situation. Suppose you were married to him and he went crying to another girl and said he did not love you? This is not our idea of an "honest Christian man." Do not let him kiss you or tell you any more of his troubles. If he obtains the divorce he talks about, you may then let him come to you with his offers—and if you take our advice you will refuse them. (2) A man of 34 is not too old to marry a girl of 22. The difference in ages is a very suitable one.

KIDO, Buckhorn, N. M.—A ring that is not an engagement circlet may be worn on any finger of either hand that the wearer chooses.

B. P., Judson, N. C.—Unless you are a mind reader, there would be no possible way except that of asking by which you could find out what qualities a particular man likes best in you, and which ones he thinks are lacking. And if you care very much about suiting him, we think you might give him a chance to tell you his opinion. (2) There is no "harmless" way of making some one jealous. It is a dangerous game which you should not play.

NOBODY'S DARLING, Scotts, Ark.—Some young men's idea of making a girl's acquaintance is to wink and smile at her. You should take absolutely no notice of any young man who uses these actions toward you.

M. L., Lenox, Fla.—You may receive the attentions of boys if your parents have no objections. Eighteen to twenty-two would be suitable ages for such boys as you might have for friends.

R. R. S., Green Forest, Ark.—It is best that a young man should use no perfume, but that he should observe strict cleanliness of person and dress.

S. and J. V., New Haven, Wyo.—When a boy escorts you home he should bring you to your door—where it is best that he should leave you. (2) The phrases you mention are vulgar slang.

G. G., Mt. Carmel, O.—We think that you are worrying without cause. Perhaps this widow does not want to "take away" the young man who loves you, and perhaps there are other girls who would like to do the same thing. But you say yourself that he "loves you with his whole heart" and pays no attention to this widow. So we think you should trust his love and not think he has deserted you and that your heart is breaking just because you have not had a letter from him for a whole week. (2) Twelve o'clock or even eleven is too late at night for a caller to stay. You ask too many questions for one month.

BRUNETTE, Dothan, Ala.—We certainly think you should give up the society of this friend whose wrong conduct you describe. Do not visit her. (2) If this divorced man bears a good character and was not to blame in the separation which took place, you may receive his letters if your parents know of the correspondence and are willing to permit it.

C. B. N., Carlton, Tex.—You should allow no boy to kiss and hug you—whether he is your cousin or not. You will only cheapen yourself in the eyes of the right sort of a man who may some day want to marry you.

BLUE-EYED WINNIE, Martin, Ga.—A sixteen-year old schoolgirl has no business being engaged, and so it should be an easy matter for you to get rid of this undesirable fiance who thinks he is going to marry you. Tell him that your parents do not approve of the match and of your marrying—or giving your promise to marry at this time. (2) Do as you please about boy number two—but do not get engaged again.

SOMEBODY'S DARLING, Scotts, Ark.—The "no kissing" rule before becoming engaged is the best one to follow, but there is no proper objection to your granting your fiance this sign of affection.

E. L. W., Augusta, Ga.—You have no cause for grievance in the matter you describe. While it might have been best for your friend to have called you over and made the introduction, she doubtless felt that as you were leaving in a few minutes by the arriving train it was not necessary or timely to make acquaintanceships. There was no slight intended, nor should you feel that one was meant on either side.

V. S., Hockerville, Okla.—A thirteen-year-old girl is little more than a child. You should be thinking of finishing your eighth grade and getting into high school, rather than asking foolish questions about boys.

IN DOUBT, Jasper, Ore.—It is possible that this young man feels that he is too young at twenty to marry—which we believe he is. And we think that you are young enough to afford to give him a little more time to make up his mind. Still, you might hint to him once in a while regarding his undefined intentions. If he objects to your going to any party with another escort, you might tell him that as he is not yet your fiance, you believe you have entire liberty to accept attentions from others until you are engaged to some particular man.

LOST FRIEND, Tennessee.—The only thing to think in a situation like yours is that young men are fickle fancied, and when they have once moved to another town they find it much easier to meet there a girl to their taste, rather than to keep up old sweethearts by mail—which is unsatisfactory lovemaking at best even when special delivery stamps are used. You are but seventeen and are wise in saying you know that you are too young for serious thought of marriage, so let this philandering young man go his way, remembering that his conduct shows he was not worth the friendship and fondness you wasted on him.

Better Worm Medicine

SCIENTISTS have discovered recently that the tiny embryo worms of adult round worms of swine (Ascaris suis) when swallowed in feed by little pigs get into the blood stream from the intestines and are carried to the lungs where they may cause pneumonia or thumps. The latter disease was attributed wholly to over-feeding and lack of exercise, but now it seems that some cases may be due to the embryo worms. Many other ailments of little or growing pigs also are due to worms so that it is a matter of great importance to prevent worms getting into the stomach and to know what to administer if worms are known to be present. Prevention is accomplished by keeping pigs off old, contaminated pasture and away from wallows and drinking water used by old hogs which harbor worms. It also is necessary to keep all feeding and watering troughs clean and to keep pigs out of old hog yards.

A new method of administering worm medicine to hogs is to put the drugs into gelatine capsules to be given by means of a balling "gun." That plan of administration works fairly well, but we have heard of some losses of pigs from gangrene of wounds of the gullet caused by the nozzle of the gun. It is much better when medicine can be given in the feed to pigs and old hogs. If that cannot be done, some men have better luck in giving drugs in water as a drench than they have in adminstering capsules.

Here is a new combination of drugs for the destruction of worms in pigs and it may be given in a little slop: Withhold feed for 24 hours, then give each pig two and one half grains each of calomel and santonin, one dram of powdered areca nut and one half a dram of bicarbonate of soda in a little slop. That is the dose for a pig of 50 pounds. Increase or decrease the dose according to age and size of pig. Repeat the dose in 10 days. During the war santonin was so expensive that it could not be profitably administered in the large doses formerly prescribed; but the price has cheapened and the smaller dose suggested here will not prove too expensive.

LAME COW.—What was the matter with my cow? At first she was lame in the left hind leg and kept swallowing all the time. The next day she grew worse, the leg drawing up toward her head. She could not straighten it out, and suffering badly all the time. I finally killed her. She was a range cow and had run out on grass all winter and not been fed any hay. When I tried to feed her she would take a mouthful and spit it out as though it didn't taste good.
MRS. T. W.

A.—We suspect that the cow was attacked by a malignant disease, such as anthrax or hemorrhagic septicemia, which are incurable but preventable by vaccination. We should more suspect blackleg were the animal less than two years old. It would be well to consult the local graduate veterinarian about the matter, as it might be necessary to vaccinate remaining cattle.

THIN FILLY.—Please tell me how to fatten horses the quickest way. (2) I have a mare three years old that has had a bad cough for three months. She is quite thin but eats well. What can I do to get her into proper condition? L. P. L.

A.—Have the teeth attended to by a veterinarian. Then feed five times a day, allowing crushed oats, wheat bran, ear corn, carrots and good mixed clover and timothy hay. (2) Teething keeps the filly from thriving and it is possible that she is also infested with worms. Have the teeth put in order, then mix in her feed twice daily for a week two teaspoonfuls of a mixture of two parts of salt and one part each of dried sulphate of iron (powdered copperas) and flowers of sulphur, then stop for 10 days and then give the powders for another week. Worms often cause cough, but it is possible of course, that heaves is the cause.

INDIGESTION.—I have a mare eight years old. She eats heartily and is thin, and when rode or driven a short distance, she pants. What is the cause and what should I do for her? J. R.

A.—Clip the mare at once and also have her teeth put in order by a veterinarian. Feed crushed oats, and wheat bran, wet, and also carrots until grass is ready. Wet the hay, which should be sound and as free from dust as possible. Allow free access to rock salt.

THUMPS.—I have a bunch of shoats that seem to be affected with thumps in their sides. So far I have had none die and finally they get well and others take it. Never has been more than five or six to have it at one time. MRS. J. A. B.

A.—Worms are a probable cause of such symptoms. Thumps has been attributed wholly to overfeeding and lack of exercise, but it is now known that embryo worms in the lungs are at least a contributory cause. Starve the pigs for 24 hours and then give for every 50 pounds of body weight two and one half grains each of calomel and santonin, one dram of powdered areca nut and one half dram of bicarbonate of soda. Give it in a little slop or warm water and repeat the dose in 10 days.

PANTING HORSE.—I have a horse eight years old, weighing 1,600 pounds, that pants. He doesn't pant much when I work him, unless he has stood in the barn three or four days. D. M.

A.—Never let any horse stand for a single day without work or active outdoor exercise, and when there is no work for him to do, greatly lessen or altogether withhold grain feed. Keep the bowels active. Do not feed any bulky feed at noon, if the horse has to work and do not feed over one pound each of grain and hay for each hundred pounds of body weight as a day's ration. So fed, the horse in question may do better, if he was not overheated sometime when at work.

WARBLES.—My cows and some of the calves have small lumps on their backs. They do not seem sore or itch, but in the lump there is a dark worm of some kind. I would like to know cause and remedy. P. W.

A.—The larvæ or grubs come from the eggs of the ox warble fly deposited in summer. Squeeze them out by pressing down hard with the open mouth of a large bottle, then destroy the grubs. In some cases it will be necessary to enlarge the openings with a small, clean knife. Wash the affected backs twice a week with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip.

GROWTH.—I have a mule that has a wart on his side. It has been there a year and keeps growing. It seems to itch, for he gnaws it, keeping it raw. How can I cure it? G. A. A.

A.—Have the growth cut out by a surgeon, who should cauterize the wound, then tie the mule so he will be unable to bite the part. If you cannot have this done, apply lard freely around the growth and then apply dilute nitric acid twice a week by means of a flat stick.

WEAK EYES.—I have a five-year-old mule that seems to have good eyes. In warm weather the flies bother him, causing his eyes to water. Is there any danger of his becoming blind, or anything I can do to prevent the flies from annoying him? J. A.

A.—In such cases we commonly find the tear ducts obstructed so that tears flow over the cheeks, make the skin sore and so attract flies. This may be stopped by having the ducts cleared by a veterinarian. A little iodoform mixed with vaseline and applied daily to the skin will keep flies away.

THIN COW.—I have a cow that seems to be hidebound. She eats heartily but stays poor and will not fatten. MRS. A. C.

A.—It is to be suspected that the cow has tuberculosis. As the disease is incurable, contagious and makes the milk dangerous for man or animals, you should at once have her tested with tuberculin and disposed of according to law if she reacts.

UNHEALTHY SKIN.—I have a full-blooded mare, coming four, which is in poor condition. There are scabs on her tail and when picked off the hair comes with them. The roots of the hair are oily and gummy. Can you tell me the cause and give a remedy? T. F. R.

A.—Hot stabling, corn feeding, lack of exercise and inadequate grooming cause such unhealthy conditions of the skin. Clip the mare and then wash affected skin with a 1-100 solution of coal tar dip. Wash the tail clean and then saturate the roots of the hair at intervals of three days, with a mixture of two ounces of flowers of sulphur, one half an ounce of coal tar dip and a pint of cotton-seed oil.

FITS.—I lost a pig seven weeks old that was taken as though the air passages were cut off, the pig opening his mouth and gasping with each breath. Could it have been croup, pneumonia or diphtheria? M. G.

A.—The pig probably had a fit or convulsion. These are commonly caused by indigestion or worms, or from too fast drinking of milk or slop when very hungry. More careful feeding prevents such attacks and pigs should be kept free from worms.

WEAK STIFLES.—I have a mule, three years old, in good condition every way, except a popping of the hock joints when he walks. It doesn't seem to be make him lame, only making a noise like the slipping of a joint. C. H.

A.—In such cases, it is the patella or knee cap of the stifle joint at the flank that makes a noise by slipping in and out of place. The hock joint is the next one below, often erroneously termed the "knee" of the hind leg. Rub stimulating liniment into the joints once or twice daily and they may improve. If not, a blister may have to be applied under direction of a qualified veterinarian.

DROPSICAL SWELLING.—My cow, when grazing on wild pasture, has a swelling under her throat. It is soft and goes down at night. It doesn't swell in winter. She eats heartily and appears to be in good condition. Is there any danger of tuberculosis? O. L. P.

A.—Any debilitating disease may cause such a dropsical swelling so it would be well to have the cow tested with tuberculin, as tuberculosis is a possibility. Such a swelling also may indicate imperfect circulation of the blood from heart disease, or may be seen in semi-starvation. Better feed the cow grain or meals in addition to grass.

Start Anti-Fly Campaign

In small towns where there are no sewer systems the problem of disposal of waste is a very serious one. In one such town in Oregon the members of the Home Economics Club, working under the direct supervision of the home demonstration agent, induced the city council to pass an ordinance requiring all privies to be made fly proof. This was a big step toward better sanitation and undoubtedly will lead to other improvements for controlling the breeding of flies. —U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

Mabel McKinley—Niece of the Late President of the United States—Takes Nuxated Iron for Health and Strength

And Says She Regards It as The Ideal Tonic For All Weak, Run-Down Nervous Women

Dr. George H. Baker, Formerly Physician and Surgeon Monmouth Memorial Hospital of New Jersey, Explains Why Iron Is One of the GREATEST OF ALL STRENGTH BUILDERS.

Says: He has found nothing in his experience so effective for helping to make strong, healthy, red-blooded women as Nuxated Iron.

Every woman who wishes to possess health, strength and beauty, should carefully read the statement of Miss McKinley who, after her personal use of Nuxated Iron tells of the results she obtained.

Miss McKinley says: "While I had often heard of Nuxated Iron I must admit that prior to using it myself I had no idea of its remarkable value for building up the health and strength.

"Following the strain imposed by months of the most exacting work singing for the soldiers in the various army encampments, together with my social engagements and charitable pursuits, I found myself in such a weakened, run-down state that I feared a complete collapse.

"It seemed utterly impossible for me to drop everything and go away for a complete rest, but I realized that as my condition was serious I must either do this or find something that would actually rebuild my waning strength and enable me to continue my activities.

"I had always been prejudiced against tonic preparations which, for the most part, I found only acted as a temporary stimulant and usually left one worse off than ever. However, when my own family physician insistently recommended that I give a fair trial to Nuxated Iron, I consented to begin its use, with a result that after a few days the weakness and exhaustion from which I suffered began to be replaced by a feeling of renewed strength and vitality. In less than three weeks' time my whole system was tingling with energy and power and I was overjoyed to find that I was once more in superb physical condition.

"Nuxated Iron has accomplished so much for me that I regard it as the ideal tonic for all weak, run-down women. As a strength, health and blood-builder, I am convinced Nuxated Iron has no equal."

In commenting on Miss McKinley's statement, regarding the efficacy of Nuxated Iron, Dr. Ferdinand King, New York Physician and Medical Author, says: "It is my opinion that in practically nine times out of ten, unstrung nerves and failing strength and vitality are due to deficiency of iron in the blood. Many a woman who is run-down, nervous and who quickly tires out, suffers from iron deficiency and does not know it. I am convinced that there are thousands of such women who, simply by taking Nuxated Iron, might readily build up their red-blood corpuscles, increase their physical energy and get themselves back to vibrant and vigorous health. By enriching the blood and increasing its oxygen carrying power, Nuxated Iron will often transform the flabby flesh, toneless tissues, and pallid cheeks of nervous, run-down women into a glow of health, and make them look younger within a surprisingly short time."

Among other physicians asked for an opinion was Dr. George H. Baker, formerly Physician and Surgeon Monmouth Memorial Hospital, New Jersey, who says: "What women need to put roses in their cheeks and the spring-time of life into their step is not cosmetics or stimulating drugs but plenty of rich, pure blood. Without it no woman can do credit to herself or to her work. Iron is one of the greatest of all strength and blood-builders, and I have found nothing in my experience so effective for helping to make strong, healthy, red-blooded women as Nuxated Iron."

Miss McKinley has a voice of unusual quality and it was following her work singing for the soldiers that she became weakened and run-down and had recourse to Nuxated Iron. Once more in superb physical condition, Miss McKinley says she is convinced that Nuxated Iron has no equal as a Strength, Health and Blood-Builder.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTE: Nuxated Iron which is recommended above by physicians is not a secret remedy but one which is well known to druggists. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed in this city by all good druggists.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

No attention will be given any inquiry which lacks the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

E. P., Casa, Ark.—There is no institution of the sort you describe, and the nearest thing to it is the U. S. Army with the opportunities that are now being offered enlisted men to learn various trades and improve their education.

E. P., Coshocton, O.—Spray your rose bushes with a strong soap solution or a not too strong solution made from one of the nicotine extracts now on the market would be most helpful in controlling the lice after they appear. You must spray thoroughly and as often as the lice appear.

MRS. L. G., Whittles Depot, Va.—Apparently there are enough Stradivarius violins owned by COMFORT readers to have kept that old master fiddle-maker busy for several lifetimes of construction. We have often stated in this column that there are but about thirty genuine Strads known to be in existence, and these have been proven and listed by violin experts. There are, however, hundreds and thousands of instruments which have been falsely branded by fraudulent dealers in "old violins" who obtain a fictitious price from some credulous buyer who believes he is getting a genuine work of one of the famous makers. A genuine Stradivarius violin is worth many thousands of dollars and could never change hands at even the far from modest prices asked by dealers in the imitation article.

I. H., Ferryville, Wis.—The bunch on your canary's leg may be a growth caused by some parasite. We believe this growth should be opened and its contents investigated and removed, but it is a delicate operation for a veterinary.

C. B. R., Garland, Ala.—The "Scientific American" gives this method for the repair of mirrors whose backing has worn off in places: Place mirror face downwards on any flat surface and with a piece of cotton carefully clean the place to be re-silvered. Now spread over the spot a piece of new tin foil a little larger than the place you are repairing. After spreading out smoothly and carefully, let fall on the center of the foil a drop or more of metallic mercury and rub the foil gently with a piece of chamois until it becomes brilliant. Now place upon this newly made amalgam a sheet of smooth writing paper and pile books or other weights upon it and leave over night. The amount of weight need not be great. The amount of mercury used for any particular repairing should correspond to three drams to each square foot of surface to be covered. While this method reads simply, the job is one that requires practice to be neatly and successfully done. Everything connected with the silvering of mirrors is far from being a "home" or amateur trick of repairing.

A. B., Saratoga Co., N. Y.—The Latin-American countries are the Spanish and Portuguese speaking countries which are contained in North and South America. We cannot give space to list them here, but any atlas or geography will furnish you with a map whereby you can identify these republics.

OLD SUBSCRIBER, Mt. Vernon, Ill.—"To buy a pig in a poke" means to purchase something one cannot see or examine in order to know its real value and whether it is worth the price paid.

MRS. M. C. T., Sanford, N. C.—It will help your frost-bitten feet if they are bathed in cold water every night, and then well dried without much rubbing. Get some "resin ointment" from your druggist and have him add to every ounce of the ointment two drams of oil of turpentine. Rub this mixture well into the feet before retiring.

E. B., Bunnlevel, N. C.—Prior to the Civil War it was often suggested by various persons that the Federal Government free the slaves by purchasing them from their southern owners, but no such plan was ever adopted. Unofficial history has it that President Lincoln had a meeting in Virginia with Alexander Stevens in which he made a tentative offer which Stevens carried South with him, but the Confederate leaders had already gone too far with their secession plans to accept and nothing came of the meeting. Any good history of the Civil War will place in your hands all available information regarding efforts made for peaceable settlement of the slavery question before the first shots were fired at Sumter.

V. S., Pa.—Colorado is a great "health" state, and it necessarily contains more sanitariums than we would care to list in the small space available in this column. We suggest that you obtain the lists you desire from the editor of "Colorado Medicine," addressing this periodical at the Metropolitan Building, Denver, Col. Enclose a stamp for reply when you write.

SUBSCRIBER, Nebr.—The proverb, "Much meat, much maladies," would mean that the eating of large quantities of meat tends to bring on various diseases. And the bearing of this proverb is quite in line with modern medical science and theories of diet.

Pepper Proved Big Bear's Undoing

Jim Cronin of Spokane, a mining man who is interested in a gold property in the Babine Mountains, intends in future to always make sure there is pepper in his camping outfit, says a dispatch from Vancouver. His mine was recently closed down for the winter, but Mr. Cronin made a belated visit there. Just as he neared the camp cabin he heard a terrible commotion. The stout log walls shook, the crash of the stove falling down, and the clatter of pans and smashing of tables and chairs caused them to approach the place with caution. As he drew near the door a mighty grizzly bear dashed out and darted past him like an avalanche going over a precipice. The animal was holding his mouth open, his eyes shut and was heading as nearly as possible for the river. Mr. Cronin investigated. He found the interior of the cabin a wreck. Lying on the floor was an empty can that once contained a half pound of red pepper. The bear's teeth-marks were plainly visible on the opened end. Mr. Cronin thinks bruin first sniffed, then snorted, and as a result filled lungs, mouth and eyes with the fiery powder, after which he sought madly to escape.—Boston Herald.

The Modern Farmer

comes. Keep radishes, lettuce, endive, string beans, peas and green corn coming all season. Don't be afraid you will have too many vegetables. Can or dry the surplus and think of how good it will taste in the winter when you are far from a city market, or how finely it will help out when you must keep your expenses down as much as possible. Farm folks should have all the milk and eggs they need, and add to this all the vegetables they can use, what more is needed to set a bountiful and well-satisfying table?

So many times in the spring we are very enthusiastic and make wonderful garden plans but somehow when the warm weather comes we forget that this is really the time when the most important work in the garden is necessary. Planting and harvesting the first early vegetables is only the beginning of the truly successful garden. Keep coming all season long, by successive plantings, the good things and make the most of your garden plot.

Remember, again, a garden isn't just plowing, planting and harvesting. There is disease, ravages of insects, droughts and other enemies that must be fought and conquered. Blight and insects can be fought with Bordeaux mixture or arsenate of lead.

The hoe is the weapon to fight the weeds. Don't "slack" for a day on the weeds. Watch for them after a warm rain. A weedy garden is a failure; weeds use up the plant food, cause disease and harbor insects. Look out for dry weather. Keep top layer of soil so well worked it forms a dust blanket which keeps the moisture in. Don't disturb soil deeply. Just the surface well raked till it is a dust. It keeps the soil from getting baked and drying out.

Sometimes garden failure is caused by lack of plant food. On the farm there is generally plenty of fertilizer of barnyard manure to plow in in the spring. But in town sometimes our gardens lack for nourishment. Such plants as cabbage, Swiss chard, parsley, celery, etc., need lots of plant food.

A liquid solution of poultry manure, or sodium nitrate may be used. Don't apply the sodium nitrate too generously or you will kill your plants.

Cultivate and then cultivate—you can't do too much of it. More failures in gardens are caused by a lack of cultivation than any other thing.

Cultivation keeps down weeds—which steal your plant food—holds moisture for the plants, lets in air which is necessary for development of root system, helps make food available to the plant, and prevents soil from baking.

"Spare the hoe and spoil the garden" is a good motto to adopt if you want to have a successful garden.

A Concrete Farm

No, a concrete farm would hardly be desirable—but a farm with all buildings made of concrete is the coming thing. We will soon see the day when many farms will be equipped with permanent buildings—cyclone and fire-proof. Such buildings are now being made of reinforced concrete.

Concrete silos, concrete hog-houses, concrete milk-houses, concrete block houses are now to be seen on every hand—and the final step, a concrete barn, is almost here. Then, with concrete tanks and concrete floors, farm buildings will be well-nigh indestructible.

Some Late Crops

It often happens that, through the use of poor seed or a backward spring or wet weather or from some other cause, we are forced to plant late crops after the regular planting season is over. What are some of these late crops?

For Hay

Use Sudan grass for hay. It can be planted late in hot weather—two weeks after corn planting is done. In fact, it does best if planted late, and for this reason should not be planted early. Twenty to twenty-five pounds of well-cleaned seed will cover an acre. It makes rapid growth and will yield two to three tons of choice hay to the acre. The time to cut for hay is when the plant is in full bloom.

Other late plants good for hay are the sorghums in the south and millet in the northern sections.

For Silage

Any of the above may be cut green directly into the silo. Soy beans, if mixed with any of the above, also make good silage. But the new silage plant that has received much attention during the past year or two is the sunflower. Sunflowers may be planted after corn, grow rapidly, yield heavily and make a very satisfactory silage. They are especially well adapted to the dry sections of the country. Several of the experiment stations west of the Mississippi are testing them as silage and thus far their reports are very encouraging.

Questions and Answers

KILLING JOHNSON GRASS.—Can anyone tell me how to kill out Johnson Grass? We have a patch on our farm that we would like to rid of this weed.

MRS. A. W. YOUNG, Ark.

A.—A good plan is to plow deep and sow the ground to Essex rape, then fence it and let hogs pasture the patch until it is bare. They will root out the grass when the other feed is short. Plow deep again after the rape is gone and reseed to any crop that succeeds well in your district. After that crop has been removed, work to a cultivaed crop like corn, tobacco or potatoes.

Let the Turkeys Grow

The turkey is still a wild bird. All the efforts of the farmer and breeder have failed to domesticate this wanderer into a barnyard dependent that puts on fat at the whim of the owner. A chicken will put feed into fat at almost any age and at any time the crop is kept filled with the right kind of feed.

The young turkey, however, is a long-legged bug hunter until the winter thatch of feathers is put on and nature suggests that it is time to store up a reserve for rigorous weather. Turkeys will put on weight rapidly and economically at that season and raisers should take advantage of it.

This, too, is the season when fields provide plenty of feed that would otherwise go to waste and, in the case of weed seeds, would do damage to future crops.

STRIKING WEIGHT COMPARISONS.—Now, when we have need for every ounce of food that can be put into form for human consumption, whether ground by mills or gizzards, it is the soundest economy to let the young turkeys live through the fall bug-and-seed-hunting season.

A young gobbler that weighs ten pounds in October will weigh twelve or thirteen sixty days later if given a little extra feed along toward the end of that period. A hen in the same time will fill out from seven pounds to nine or ten. Such satisfactory gains can be made at no other time in the bird's life. It is the season when nature is preparing for winter. The turkey hasn't learned to depend on the farmer's grain bins.

This is the time of year to exterminate mosquitoes by draining all stagnant pools, or by pouring oil on them, or by stocking them with small fish. Do not let water stand for days in barrels, tubs or horse troughs.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

H. A. C., Vermont.—If you can substantiate by the proper evidence that the easement you describe in your neighbor's land has been continuously used by you and the former owners of your property for a period of sixty years, we do not think your neighbor can now prohibit you from the use of the same.

Mrs. E. S., Kentucky.—If, as you state, your mother turned her money over to your stepfather 23 years ago, we do not think you can now compel him to account to your mother's estate for same.

E. E. H., Colorado.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman is entitled to the full control of her separate property and all of the increase thereof and she can sell and dispose of the same without her husband's consent except that his consent is necessary to the mortgaging or conveyance of property registered as a homestead; she has equal rights with her husband to the custody of their children, and in case of the separation of the parents the custody of the children is a question for the courts to decide.

S. S. B., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man or woman, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, the surviving spouse, if there are other kindred, shall be entitled to the real or personal estate, or both, to the aggregate value of five thousand dollars in addition, in the case of a widow, to her exemption allowed by law, and, if such estate exceeds in value the sum of five thousand dollars, the surviving spouse shall be entitled to the sum of five thousand dollars, absolutely, to be chosen by him or her from the real or personal estate or both, and in addition thereto shall be entitled to one half part of the remaining real and personal estate, it being provided by the intestate act that these provisions as to said five thousand dollars shall apply only to cases of actual intestacy of husband or wife and not to cases where the surviving spouse shall elect to take against the will of the deceased spouse.

A. M. H., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your mother, if she leaves no will and does not remarry, her whole estate will be divided in equal shares among her children, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share; the property which came to her from her first husband, as well as the property which came to her from her child by the first marriage, will, of course, be included in her estate.

Mrs. E. K., Florida.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that unless a married woman has been legally declared a free trader, her property is under the care and management of her husband, but he shall not charge for such care nor management, nor shall the wife be entitled to sue her husband for the rent, hire, issues, proceeds or profits of her said property; she is entitled to receive support from him, unless she abandons him without good cause, and he can be compelled to treat her in a proper manner.

Mrs. O. C., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the road you mention is a public road, the owner of the adjoining property has no legal right to close same, because the public authorities have neglected to work the road; but if the road belongs to the man who closed it, he has a legal right to close same.

Mrs. I. B. R., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your right to cut and remove the growing crop upon the farm you rent after the termination of your lease would depend upon the terms of your lease, if there is no agreement as to this in your lease, we think the custom of your locality would prevail; we think the custom of your locality is for the tenant to return and cut and remove his growing winter grain crops when they ripen after the term of his lease has expired.

O. E., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of the parents or guardian is necessary for the marriage of either males or females under 21 years of age; we think the age limit is lower in Tennessee.

Mrs. G. E. M., Connecticut.—Under the laws of your state, we think it possible for your husband to deed his real estate to you both as tenants by the entirety so that the whole of said real estate will, upon the death of one of you, become the sole property of the survivor. If your name is not in the present existing deed of the property, we think, upon his death without a will, you will only have your share in the property, and, if he desires you to have the whole property upon his death, it will be necessary for him to either have the deed so drawn or to make a will to that effect. We think you should have some competent local attorney attend to this for you.

Mrs. R. H. V., West Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we think it possible for your husband to cannot be compelled to support his adult children, unless they are incapacitated and unable to support themselves; we think he should notify the merchants with whom they run bills in his name that he will not be responsible for their debts. We do not think your son by a former marriage will have any interest in his stepfather's estate, unless some provision is made for him by will.

Mrs. C. B. McC., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if your mother dies without a will, your stepfather will have an interest in her estate; just how much of your father's estate came to your mother upon his death and will be included in her estate upon her death, depends upon matters not stated in your communication. If she simply has a dower interest in his real estate, this would die out with her and such real estate would come to you and your brother upon her death. We think if your brother is now remarried to the wife from whom he was divorced, upon his death without a will, she would receive one half of his estate if your brother leaves no child or descendant; if he has not remarried his former wife, we think her interest in his estate, if any, would depend upon the decree of divorce and the validity of the same.

G. C., Kentucky.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that it is possible to procure good title to real estate through tax sales provided the same was legally conducted and all the requirements complied with and provided the period of redemption has expired; we think an examination of your title would be necessary to determine whether your title is good. We think tax titles are often set aside by reason of the failure to meet all the necessary requirements.

H. L. T., Michigan.—An unmarried man who is the head of a family has an exemption under the Federal income tax law of $2,000; if he is not the head of a family and has no one whose principal support is derived from him and who is dependant upon him, his exemption is $1,000.

C. B. W., New Jersey.—We are unable to form an opinion upon the fairness of a legal charge of $150 for making the title search you mention without any information as to the amount of labor involved in making such search. (2) We think if the builder you mention refuses to return your building plans to you, it will be necessary for you to proceed against him for such damages as you have suffered.

E. U. H., Ohio.—Under the laws of Kansas, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, without any surviving wife or descendants, and without leaving a will, his whole estate would go to his parents or the survivor of them; if both are dead, the estate is disposed of as if they, or either of them, had outlived the intestate and died in ownership and possession of the property. In no event would the surviving husband of a daughter of the decedent who predeceased her father, leaving no child or descendant, receive any of the property unless some provision was made for him by will.

Miss E. O., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon your death, without a will, and without a surviving husband, child or descendant, and without a surviving parent, your estate would be divided among your sisters and brother, the descendants of any such as may predecease you taking their parent's share. Such property as you inherited absolutely from your mother's estate would be included in your estate upon your death, but if there was any limitation in your mother's will as to the property you received from her, you are, of course, bound by such limitation.

H. H., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the owner of the horse you mention insured your mares to be with foal, he is not entitled to any service fee unless such proves to be the case; if, however, the charge was for service, without any insurance, we think he is entitled to his fee.

S. W. S., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that if the woman, you mention, who administered her husband's estate, purposely neglected to name her husband's son by a former marriage as an heir of her husband's estate, she was guilty of fraud and can be punished for her act; we think, in any event, the young man is entitled to his share in his father's estate and should proceed at once to enforce his claim.

Mrs. M. C., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a surviving widow and two children as his only heirs-at-law and next of kin, his estate would go to such surviving widow and two children in equal shares, the widow being entitled to remain in possession of the homestead until disposed of according to law; we do not think he can dispose of more than two thirds of his estate by will to any person other than his widow; we think he can select any person he may desire as his executor but that any person in interest can contest the qualification of such executor if he is incompetent or dishonest, and the courts have power to refuse the qualification of an executor or can remove him after qualification for proper cause. We do not think the wife can compel her husband to deed his property, or any part, of it, to her.

The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be taken to your local doctor.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

Mrs. F. W. L., Mt. Sterling, Ill.—You have, no doubt, chronic catarrhal deafness, and the only thing for you to do is to have intelligent local treatment by some good specialist. If you do not have this treatment you will undoubtedly get worse, and finally lose your hearing altogether.

Miss M. H., Moultrie, Ga.—It would take a week to answer all the questions you have asked, but they can be grouped and answered as follows: For removing the hairs, anywhere, the only sure treatment is the electric needle in skilled hands. Your general symptoms, dizziness, weakness, etc., can be helped by the use of a good tonic, such as Basham's mixture, taken in tablespoonful doses after meals. For the dandruff, wash the hair with some good tar soap and apply every other day a two per cent lotion of resorcin in grain alcohol. The tonic will improve your memory as you regain your strength. For the blackheads, steam the face and apply at night lotio alba, which can be obtained at any drug store.

Mrs. H. O. C., Scarbro, West Va.—Ovarian extract should be used only under the advice of your doctor.

Mrs. A. E., Pollock, Idaho.—You are overworking and have, no doubt, some local trouble due to the birth of child. You should be examined and, if torn, have the tear or tears restored. For the milk leg, try bandaging with a flannel bandage, wear the bandage during the day and remove it at night. You may need glasses and should have eyes examined by some competent party.

Mrs. J. McK.—Bust developers are, as a rule, harmless and no doubt have some effect in developing the bust. Massage with some good cream is advisable and will not hurt the sexual organs at all. Basham's mixture is best for a tonic. Take one tablespoonful in water after meals.

Miss E. W., Independence, Oregon.—You had better have your eyes examined and find out if eye strain has anything to do with the pressure on head, and also take some five-grain assafetida pills after meals for the nervousness.

Miss M. M., Larsen, Wis.—A great deal of your trouble is nervousness, and probably some five-grain assafetida pills taken after meals would help you. Also have your back ironed with a hot flatiron. Wring out several thicknesses of flannel in hot mustard water, apply to the back and then iron the back so as to thoroughly steam the back. This will no doubt stop the backache, and may help you get rid of it entirely.

Mrs. H. D., Peasleeville, N. Y.—Don't know anything about the anti-fat remedies suggested. The best way is by a simple diet on alternate days and on other days confining one's self to the skimmed milk diet only. The milk should be taken as follows: one glass in the morning, one at noon, another about four o'clock and the last glass at night, or on retiring. Also exercise is indicated and, as suggested, care in eating starchy foods on the alternate days.

Mrs. S. J., Fulton, Ala.—You, no doubt, have malaria. Better take teaspoonful doses of Huxham's tincture after meals, well diluted. If you cannot get this mixture you might try compound tincture of cinchona in tablespoonful doses.

Mrs. J. L. D., Colorado Springs, Colo.—Try, for the convulsions, five-grain doses of bromide of sodium after meals. Also limit the diet to good digestible food and keep the bowels open.

Miss M. H., Detroit, Mich.—Obstruction of the portal circulation of the liver and chronic constipation are the causes of hemorrhoids, or bleeding piles, so-called. If the bleeding is excessive, you had better be examined and, if thought best, be operated on for the hemorrhoids.

Mrs. J. P. P., Belham, Ga.—You can get cocoa-butter at any drug store as well as Basham's mixture.

circus tent to see what's going on without paying the price we all must pay to see the whole show, and that is death and the undertaker's bill. My advice is to let this thing alone. If there is life after death, death will come soon enough for you to realize all the facts, and if death means annihilation, then look what a lot of time you have wasted and what a lot of foolishness you have indulged in. The people who want to poke their noses into the next world are like the baby who wants to make a hole in the drum to see where the noise comes from. As soon as they get to the next world they will be hauling out their ouija boards and trying to communicate with another world and so on ad infinitum, never getting any real satisfaction out of any world. Dr. Manning, of Holy Trinity Church, New York, says that in the old Testament, the Jews were distinctly forbidden to try to communicate with the dead. And the mind of the Christian Church has always been against it. "The darkened room, the tipping of tables, the mystery, the medium, which may prove to be fraudulent do not seem to be in harmony with a high and holy purpose." Dr. Manning asks if these alleged communications have added anything to our knowledge of life beyond the grave and most emphatically denies that they have. He asserts in many cases, spiritism produces positive injury to body, mind and morals: "The evidence does not show," he says, "that spiritism has any tendency to bring people to a deeper sense of their duty to God and a truer faith in Jesus Christ." Dr. Frank Crane says: "Most of the spirit messages are piddling. It is medieval. It bears the same relation to intelligent faith that astrology does to astronomy. It is the collapse of the mind * * * the childish confusion of the soul. For the strong it is of no use, for the weak * * * that way madness lies." Sir William Barrett in "On the Threshold of the Unseen," says: "It is the weakening of the sense of personal responsibility that constitutes, in my opinion, the chief peril of spiritism. Hence your gates need to be guarded with jealous care, even the level-headed should walk warily, and the excitable and emotional should have nothing to do with it, for the fascination of the subject is like candle to moths, it attracts and burns the silly, the credulous and the crazy." In short, it is spook stuff.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for June

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

Written references from doctor and postmaster must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

Mrs. Furley Mollett, Davisport, Ky. Sick, aged, blind and poor. Send her some of the sympathy that buys bread. Mrs. Lucinda Purdy, Stuart, R. R. 5, Va. Crippled from rheumatism. No means of support. Would appreciate second-hand clothing and any assistance you care to send her. Callie D. Barefoot, Four Oaks, N. C. Invalid for many years. Send her some cheer. Mrs. Mattie E. Leake, Spencer, Va. Widow, with one small boy, five years of age. Sick from rheumatism for a number of years and unable to work. Would appreciate second-hand clothing and any assistance you care to send her. No means of support. Well recommended. Miss Carrie Hall, Strieby, N. C. Cripple, 17 years of age. Would be grateful for second-hand clothing, reading matter and anything you care to send her. John Robinson, Buffalo Poor Farm, Springfield, Ill. Sixty-five years of age. Almost blind. Send him some cheer. Mrs. Jennie Agee, Spencer, R. R. 1, Box 35, Va. Sick, poor and needy. Do not forget her. Mrs. Polly. Carter, Price, R. R. 2, N. C. Widow, 75 years of age. Sick, poor and alone. Would be grateful for second-hand clothing, also some financial assistance. Well recommended.

Be good and you'll be happy. The only way to be good is to do good. Faith without works is dead. Prayers, tracts and sympathy are all right but it takes money to buy bread. Christianity that is not practical cuts no ice in heaven or on earth. Now I've told you what to do. Open your hearts as well as your pocketbooks if you want a blessing.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

No More Wrinkles

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE

Superfluous Hair Vanishes Like Magic. Eyelashes Beautified

Pimples and Blackheads Removed Forever

Let this woman send you free, everything she agrees, and beautify your face and form quickly.

This clever woman has not a wrinkle upon her face; she has perfected a marvelous, simple method which brought a wonderful change in her face. For removing wrinkles, her method is truly wonderfully rapid.

She made herself the woman she is today and brought about the wonderful change in her appearance in a pleasant manner. Her complexion is as clear and fair as that of a child. She had thin, scrawny eye-lashes and eyebrows, which could scarcely be seen, and she made them long, thick and beautiful by her own methods and removed every blackhead and pimple from her face.

Nothing is taken into the stomach, no common massage, no harmful plasters, no worthless creams.

By her new process, she removes wrinkles and develops the whole figure plump and fat.

It is simply astonishing the hundreds of women who write in regarding the wonderful results from this new beauty treatment, which is beautifying their face and form after beauty doctors and other methods failed. She has thousands of letters on file like the following.

Mrs. M. L. B. Albin, Miss., writes: "I have used your beauty treatment with wonderful success. I have not a wrinkle on my face now and it is also improving my complexion, which has always troubled me with pimples and blackheads. My weight was 112 pounds before taking your treatment and now I weigh 117, a gain of 5 pounds. Your treatment is a God send to all thin women. I am so grateful you may even use my letter if you wish."

The valuable new beauty book which Madame Clare is sending free to thousands of women is certainly a blessing to women.

All our readers should write her at once and she will tell you absolutely free; about her various new beauty treatments and will show our readers:

How to remove wrinkles in 6 hours;
How to make long, thick eyelashes and eyebrows;
How to remove superfluous hair;
How to remove blackheads, pimples and freckles;
How to remove dark circles under the eyes;
How to quickly remove double chin;
How to build up sunken cheeks and add flesh to the body;
How to darken gray hair and stop hair falling;
How to stop forever perspiration odor.

Simply address your letter to Helen Clare, Suite A 354, 3311 Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill., and don't send any money, because particulars are free, as this charming woman is doing her utmost to benefit girls or women in need of information which will add to their beauty and make life sweeter and lovelier in every way.

Two Wheel Chairs in May

556 Is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The two May wheel chairs go to Clarence Virgil Hudgins, Fort Spunkey, Texas, 142, and Fannie Margaret Ball, Ellis, La., 82. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends for them.

Clarence Virgil Hudgins, age 15, was stricken with a fever in infancy which paralyzed his legs and they have never developed but are crooked and twisted and entirely useless so that he has never been able to walk. The upper part of his body is nearly normal and he drags himself along with his arms. He will be able to make good use of his wheel chair which will be a joy to him.

Fannie Margaret Ball, age 5 years, has been crippled from birth by paralysis of her lower limbs. As she can use her arms she will soon learn to get about in her little wheel chair.

Last month I sent out five wheel chairs and the month before six, but this month the subscriptions warranted an award of only two wheel chairs, as above specified. It is a pity that the wheel-chair subscriptions should fall down so at this season when the unfortunate crippled shut-ins are most in need of wheel chairs to get them out into the air and sunshine.

I know that with the advent of spring you are all very busy with your affairs; but try to spare some time, even in your busy season, to get subscriptions to help provide wheel chairs for the shut-ins.

You will be interested in the following letters of thanks and Roll of Honor.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT,

Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 150 one-year subscriptions to COMFORT, at 50 cents each, sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some needy crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

A Game for Kings

By Carl Schurz Lowden

Chess was invented by a Brahmin, named Sissa, to discipline a king who despised the counsels of the Brahmins and Rajahs and was intoxicated with his own greatness. Sissa endeavored by strategy to open the young monarch's eyes and to teach him that only the love of his people keeps a king on his throne.

The game became popular. The king heard of it. As he knew that Sissa had invented it, he asked the Brahmin to instruct him how to play it. Sissa straightway seized his opportunity and skillfully showed him that the king, the most important of all the pieces, can neither attack nor defend himself without the assistance of his subjects.

The monarch speedily saw that he had been foolish in disregarding the advice and council of his people. He perceived that he had allowed himself to be corrupted by flatterers. He was very grateful to Sissa and asked him what he would like as a reward.

"Give me," Sissa replied, "as much rice as can be placed on the sixty-four squares of the chess-board by putting one grain on the first, two on the second, four on the third, and so on, the number on each square always doubling."

The king cheerfully agreed, but his treasurers convinced him that he had pledged himself to an act of munificence which he would be unable to fulfill. Sissa then intervened and pointed out to the king that a monarch must be continuously on his guard against those who surround him, as otherwise it would be easy to abuse his best intentions.

If Sissa, the Brahmin, had been a German of the twentieth century, would the invention of the game of chess and the instruction of William with the accompanying skillful lesson on the attitude of a king toward his subjects—would the world war have been averted? Some day William may regret that he did not have a Sissa to show him the truth.

Reported Missing in Action

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

By Augustin W. Breeden

IT was a wild March day. The wind had blown the pink into the buds of the peaches at the little mountain homestead where the Widow Saunders lived with her indigent father and her one daughter, Jewell. And the same wild March wind that had blown the color into the peach buds had blown the bloom into the cheeks of pretty nineteen-year-old Jewell Saunders. Or was it the note she had had that morning from the wild young man, Harold Joyce, telling her that she might expect to see him during the day and to be on the lookout for him, that had made her cheeks so rosy? At any rate, as she followed after her old grandfather and his bony old horse across the flinty steep rows that he was laying off, planting the corn that her mother, coming many rows behind, covered with a dull hoe, her eyes were bright like dew-wet pansies and her cheeks the color of the peach buds.

Every one said that Harold Joyce was wild, but Jewell knew better. True, he rode a horse that few could ride, he was the best shot in the Ozarks and the most daring boatman on the James River, and he walked with a swagger probably due to the fact that he spent so much time in the saddle, and spoke with a slow drawl supposed to indicate a dangerous fondness for a gun trigger; but the girl knew him to be the most tender-hearted of young men. She had once seen him, during the first year she knew him at the Academy of Highlandville, nearly break the back of a bully for mistreating a young boy. She had seen him stop in the midst of a wild chase after a dog and a raccoon to pluck a mid-winter violet. She had seen him sneak candy to the poor Sykes children when every one forgot them at Christmas time, and blush like a girl when he was caught in the act. This big red-headed youth from the lowland might chafe at restraint and scorn to walk between plow handles on his father's rich river farm, but he was incapable of anything coarse or low or truckling. Anyway, Captain Joyce, his father, needed him to watch after his herds of half-wild cattle in the mountains more than he needed him in the field.

As Jewell came over the hump of a hill in the field she saw Harold waiting at the end of her row carelessly leaning against the rickety rail fence. She laid down her corn bag and hurried to the fence to meet him.

"I've done it, little girl," he said. "I've decided to go to Canada and enlist. "They seem so slow at Washington I'm afraid we'll never declare war and I just can't stand to stay out of it any longer. I'm off in two or three days. You remember your promise?"

"Yes."

"Can you meet me in Gentry day after tomorrow?"

"That's Saturday, isn't it, and the day Mamma sends the butter and eggs; but, Harold, I—— I've nothing nice enough to be married in."

"I'll get you the best rig in town."

"Harold, you know I couldn't let you do that. Besides, Harrie, everybody would know; and you know you said it would be a secret wedding. You can't imagine how Mamma and Grandpa hate your father and you and all you low country people on account of this range war. They think you have no right to graze your cattle in the mountains and they call your father an aristocrat because he was an officer in the Confederate army. You know us mountaineers all fought on the other side."

"I know. And they say I'm wild. That I carry a pistol on my hip. If I didn't, some of these people would poison my cattle and shoot me in the big road. But the wedding shall be secret. You're nineteen; you have the right."

"Yes, but they want me to marry my cousin Jim. Jim's a good boy, but I don't love him, and I saw him run that night of the dance on Dry Creek when the Rock County crowd got to shooting. I could never marry a man that is gun-shy."

"Then I tell you what you do. You come to that dance on Indian Ridge tomorrow night. I'll ride to Higlandville tomorrow and get the license and a preacher and two witnesses that will play shut mouth afterwards. It's not a quarter of a mile from where the dance is to the county line, so we'll marry in Rock County. Jim will bring you to the dance, and you and I can slip out between sets and be married when we get back. Coming?"

"Yes."

"Oh, you brave, brave little girl!" The young man caught the slim young girl to him across the fence and their troth was plighted.

"Jew-ell, Jew-ell." It was the mother calling. The old grandfather had turned the row and his horse's head could be seen coming over the hill.

"Poor Grandpa," said the girl answering something in her own thoughts. "He is so feeble and we are so poor!"

"I want you to keep Buster and Drum Boy and, and Dixie Kid for me while I am gone."

"But Harold—I will keep your dogs, of course—that would be a—a wife's duty, but the horse Dixie Kidd—it might seem like——"

"I'll fix it O. K. Remember, tomorrow night!" Harold leaped upon Dixie Kidd and galloped away.

"Whut you lookin' so pink and so foolish fur?" inquired the mother later, coming up with her hoe. "Hev you ben talking to that low down Joyce boy? I seed him ridin' away."

"Yes, Mother, I've been talking to him. He—— he's going away."

"That's no news; he's allus goin' away some'er's when he ain't coming back. Whar's he goin' this time? Rock Kiounty er the Indian Nation?"

"He's going to war, Mother. He says he thinks any honest man ought to get on over there and help the Belgians and French; so he's going."

"An' good riddance of bad rubbish," snapped the mother.

The girl did not reply. Instead she dutifully dropped her eyes and started across the rocky field, dropping seed corn.

So it was that Jewell Saunders rode back from the dance on Indian Ridge with a ring on her finger that she had not worn going over, and which she was careful to conceal from her amourous cousin and all others; and Sunday morning the Saunders household awoke to find Dixie Kidd grazing in their pasture lot with a note tied to his mane stating that Harold Joyce was lending him to Mrs. Saunders till he should get back from overseas. And tied not far from the Saunders cabin, and whining to be untied, were Buster and Drum Boy, but with no note tied to them; for no true mountaineer is ever unkind to a stray dog.

That was in March, 1917, and two weeks later the United States declared war. So Harold did not have to enlist in Canada, after all. In August of that year he passed through Paris on his way up to the Toul sector, where the Americans, a pitiful handful, were training for later efficiency. In the early fall he was transferred to the engineers, and following the battle of Cambrai he was reported "Missing in Action."

Not that he was reported soon after the big battle was fought; the news came slowly, percolating through, drop by drop. In November, Jewell had a letter from him written in August. In December she had a letter saying he had been up at the front and found it "interesting." His mother also had three letters from him written at different times, but arriving in December. Jewell rode Dixie Kidd to the big Joyce plantation and the mother showed her the letters. Then on New Year's Day the word came, "Missing in Action." On the same day that the girl got the news by way of the Joyce plantation she also got a very cheerful letter from Harold written a week before the battle of Cambrai. It seemed to the tearful girl as if she could see her husband and sweetheart alive before her as she read his brave words.

That day she got upon Dixie Kid and rode madly across the hills in the bitter winter wind. In the late afternoon, under a fiery winter sunset she met Harold's mother also riding madly across the hills. They stopped and talked.

"He was the best one of my boys," said the mother.

"He was the kindest hearted young man I ever met," said the girl.

"He scorned a lie," said the mother.

"He was the truest friend I ever had," said the girl.

"He often spoke of you to me," said the mother.

"And of you to me," replied the girl.

"Missing in action," repeated the older woman to herself. "It is hard to bear. I could almost wish he he were reported killed outright."

"Wasn't the report 'wounded and missing in action'?" asked the girl, with tears in her voice.

"Yes, I have a letter from a comrade of his, who said he left him in a shell hole. My brave boy begged him to run for it and save himself. You see, Harrie was wounded in the leg. The comrade left him, hoping later to return with help and bring him out of the zone of fire. But the Germans took the ground, and later when our men returned my boy was not there."

"He will be found," said the girl with a brave lift of the head. "He will be found alive."

"I have given up hope," replied the mother. "I have been in almost daily communication with the War Office. They hold out no hope."

Thus the two, the bereaved young wife and the bereaved old mother, met and parted.

The girl rode toward home with her head held high and her eyes bright, but not merely with tears. The next morning she rode through a blinding snowstorm to the cabin where her cousin Jim was holding down a small land claim and keeping bach.

"Jim," she said, "you're not making anything here, are you?"

"Not much."

"I thought not. Dixie Kidd here is a good plow horse if he is a bit wild under the saddle. Wi a him and Grandpa's old horse you could make a fine crop on our place, now couldn't you?"

"I shore could."

"Jim, what is your classification in the draft?"

"A 1, but I'm tryin' to git hit changed."

"I'll tell you how you can get it changed," persuaded the girl. "I'll lend you Dixie Kidd. You come and support my mother and yourn and my grandfather. As the only support of your aunt and grandfather, you will never have to go overseas."

Jim's eyes gleamed. He thought he read more in the girl's words than she had spoken. "An' I'll support you too, gladly," he said with a sheepish grin.

"Me too?" asked the girl archly. "Now that is kind, but perhaps I can support myself for a time yet. You'll come and live with us?"

"I'll come tomorrow."

The next day Jewell rode Dixie to Gentry. She went to her old friend Tom Manning, who was in the livery business.

"What'll you give me for this saddle?" she asked.

"W'y that's Harold Joyce's saddle, ain't it?"

"Sure is, or rather was. He gave it to me. What'll you give me for it?"

"Forty dollars."

"It's yourn," said the girl, with a laugh. "And how much for this lariat and plaited horsehair bridle?"

"Eight, seein' hit's you."

"They're yourn," repeated the girl.

Six weeks later found the girl on board the Touraine, a French liner, sailing for France with two dozen other girls and women young and old. Her progress had been difficult but swift. With a letter from the wife of Captain Joyce she had gone to St. Louis and applied for training in a hospital, but learning how slow that was as a method of getting overseas, she had at once gone on to New York. There she had called, always with her letter, on the three institutions she knew of, the public library, the Y. W. C. A., and the Butterick Pattern Company. At each place they had been kind to her, but offered no immediate way for her to achieve her desire. Then one night she was tramping footsore and discouraged toward her hotel and she passed a Salvation Army singing in the street. They were singing:

"We'll go over, yes, go over,
To the boys beyond the seas,
And we'll tell them there of Jesus,
And their troubles we will ease.
We'll go over, we're going over,
And we won't come back so long as we can please."

Then and there she set in to convince the kindly-faced matron that she "could please" by baking for the boys the finest kind of biscuit. And so on board the Touraine she went over. The war was now on in earnest. The news of the sinking of the Tuscania had gone over the country like wildfire. Every organization was straining to do its best, and the Salvation Army was in the forefront. The party that Jewell was with landed at Bordeaux, they were whirled up to Paris, they were rushed out to the Toul Sector in motor lorries.

Jewell had a sad but delicious feeling as she reflected that she was probably riding through the same streets and looking at the same houses that Harold had looked at only a few months before. Then she received the surprise of her life. The head of the committee which at Toul came out to receive their party was Mrs. Joyce, Harold's mother.

Then it was that Jewell, who had kept a tight mouth and told no one of her secret marriage and her secret sorrow, wept upon Mrs. Joyce's shoulder and told her all.

"You dear, dear child," wept the mother. "I thought myself a heroine for coming over, but no longer. You are the heroine. Do you realize you will sometimes be under fire?"

"Am I better than Harold?" asked the girl simply. "He went under fire!"

Events happened rapidly that spring in Europe. The two women had hardly settled together in a little room, when they were ordered farther west in the Champaign district. And on March 21, exactly a year from the day the girl was married and her soldier husband marched away, she received her first baptism of fire. All day long and then all night long the brave mountain girl celebrated the anniversary of her wedding by serving hot chocolate and biscuit to the wounded but cheerful men streaming back from the firing line. And all day and all night the shells screamed and burst in fireworks overhead like forty thousand Fourths of July rolled into one. At first the girl felt herself exhilerated by it all and then she had a visitation of what a bombardment could mean. The canteen was hit, and three girls, all acquaintances of hers, were killed.

The second night, what was worse, the Americans were forced to fall back. They started back, the soldiers protesting, the officers insisting. For four hours of shell-lit darkness in a blinding snow, the red cross lassies retreated with their soldier men. Part of the time clinging to bumping or creeping auto trucks, most of the time walking like good soldiers that the wounded might ride.

Then at midnight, there was a mixup, a battle, a skirmish, what you will. The Germans maneuvered a flank attack. Horror reigned in the darkness for perhaps half an hour, and at the end of it, Mother Joyce and Jewell, and a badly wounded Red Cross woman whom neither had seen before, found themselves prisoners under a German guard.

I shall not attempt to reveal all the horror and mental anxiety through which these women passed. One week later at Coblenz, the Red Cross woman died of her wounds. The other two were kept in a small city on the Saar, wholly among strangers, constantly under guard. They got no news from the outside world. They were not permitted to be visited either by the Spanish or Swiss authorities who were looking after the mercy work among prisoners in Germany. They were simply under the guard of the mayor and police of the little city where they were permitted to live. They heard that Paris was taken. They were told that the channel ports had one after another fallen to the Germans.

In America, they were reported "Missing in Action" just as Harold had been so reported before them. The younger woman stayed constantly in the presence of the elder. At night they had to endure the sight of a policeman stationed outside their window and pressing his face to the glass and looking in from time to time, and in bad weather one was quartered in the little front entrance hall of their tiny house. They were not permitted to curtain their windows.

In July their worst annoyance began. An officer, a great German beast of perhaps forty-five, began to try to force his attentions upon Jewell.

"Why not marry me, my leetle frauline?" he begged. "You two vill have to spend your days in de Vaterland anyvay. Fy not become mine vife?"

TO BE CONCLUDED IN JULY.

The World's Highest Auto Road

Guess where it is—in this country or abroad, in South America, Asia, or Europe. How high is it? How long is it? How many years, according to authorities, would be required to build it? But how soon was it really finished?

Eugene A. Sunderling of Colorado was the determined man who carried the project to success in the time that intervened between the last snowfall of spring and the first in the autumn of the same year. It is a triumph of engineering which experts predicted could not be accomplished in less than two years.

The road reaches into the clouds to the extent of two and a half miles and then some—14,109 feet. That is the altitude; the actual distance of the highway, winding as it does around the mountain, approximates seventeen miles. The steepest grades reach ten percent with six the average.

To break up the boulders for making one mile of the route, a carload of dynamite was used. Hard-packed granite provides a smooth surface. Many parapets of masonry and five bridges of solid concrete render the road safe and the automobile trip to the top of Pike's Peak an invigorating pleasure.

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

Why Congress Will Decline the Armenian Mandate that Europe Is Trying to Wish on America

SCANT time was allowed our country to sense the relief vouchsafed it from entanglement in the League of Nations snare ere it was confronted with another insidious attempt to involve the United States in the vexatious international disputes that for centuries have been a fruitful cause of wars in Europe and Asia and to a large extent are responsible for the present state of turmoil that is still harassing those continents. It came in the form of an urgent request from Great Britain, France and Italy that the United States accept a mandate over the newly created Republic of Armenia, and was communicated on May 24th in a special message by President Wilson in which he asked Congress to authorize the assumption by our Government of this difficult and burdensome task.

Armenia has attained world-wide notoriety through the newspaper reports of frequent massacres and other forms of cruel oppression inflicted by the Turks on the Armenians, which is about as much as most people know of that ancient and at one time powerful country. Its history runs back into remote antiquity long antedating the Christian era. The Armenians are Christians and assert with great pride that the Armenian Church was founded by one of the Apostles. Ancient Armenia occupied the high tableland extending from the Caucasus mountains south to Mount Taurus, including the sources of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers, and reached from the Black Sea on the west to the Caspian Sea on the east. Mount Ararat, 17,550 feet high, on which Noah's ark landed, is in this territory, and it is believed by Bible students that the Garden of Eden also was situated in Armenia. Aside from tradition, which accords it the distinction of being the cradle of the human race, it is known to be one of the oldest countries on earth and to have had a checkered and for the most part troubled career.

Though at one time risen to a status of considerable power and influence, Armenia had the misfortune to lie athwart the pathway of all the great Oriental conquerors and lacked the strength to successfully oppose their victorious progress. Consequently she has been the prey successively of these numerous military tyrants, and through the ages has been unable to maintain an independent national existence except at intermittent intervals. Of all the foreign oppressors of Armenia the Turks, who conquered this unhappy country some centuries ago, have proved the most cruel and murderous, due in part to religious differences; the Turks being fanatical Mohammedans while the Armenians have continued steadfast Christians in spite of the most terrible persecution because of their faith. Another reason for the Turks' hatred of the Armenians is that the latter, like the Jews, have a natural aptitude for trade, and thousands of them, having left their old homes and scattered throughout the Turkish dominions to engage in trade or in the mechanic arts, have prospered to a degree that has excited the envy and jealousy of the Turks who are no match for the Armenians in business or in the practice of the arts, crafts and professions. They regard the Christian Armenian who is absorbing a considerable share of the wealth of the community as a heretic and profiteer, and consider it the privilege, if not the duty, of "the faithful" to rob and murder the wealthy unbeliever.

For centuries this persecution, not only of the Armenians but also of the millions of other Christian and Jewish subjects of the Sultan, has been going on in Turkey, and it is a notorious scandal that the great Christian nations of Europe, which by uniting in issuing word of warning to Turkey could have put an end to these outrages at any time, have failed to act because of their jealousy of each other. The case of suffering Armenia was similar to that of the Balkan states which formerly were under Turkish misrule but were liberated years ago because of persistent persecution of their Christian inhabitants. Ever since their separation from Turkey these little Balkan kingdoms have been the subject of endless intrigue and a hotbed for propagating European wars. It will be remembered that it was Germany's support of Austria's aggression against Servia (one of the Balkan kingdoms) that precipitated the World War. And one of the worst indictments against Germany for cruelty in the conduct of the war was based on her allowing and even encouraging wholesale massacres of the Armenians by Turkey, her dependent and servile ally.

The World War brought decisive action on the matter of Turkey's abuse of her Christian subjects, and when she surrendered the Allies required her to give up her Christian provinces. As these liberated Turkish provinces were not strong enough to stand alone they were to be placed respectively under the protection of one or other of the Allies. This assumption of guardianship was called a mandate. France accepted the mandate over Syria and is having so much trouble over it that she is sick of the job already. Great Britain has undertaken the mandates over Judea and Mesopotamia, in both of which she has interests of her own to protect. But the toughest, dirtiest job of all, the one that no European Power is willing to undertake is the mandate over Armenia, and so they all join in asking Uncle Sam to shoulder this burden.

Our acceptance of this mandate would mean that we should have to maintain a naval force in the Black Sea, five thousand miles away from home, and send over and keep a standing army in Armenia to preserve order within the country and protect it against attacks from without by the Turks on the one side and the Russian Bolsheviki on the other. This would be an expensive job, adding hundreds of millions to our taxes which already are excessively burdensome, and it might result in involving us in a war with Turkey or Russia or both, the possible consequences of which are horrible to contemplate. Above all we should decline this mandate because its acceptance would be a departure from the steadfast policy of the United States since the time of Washington to keep out of European intrigues and entanglements.

Just what territory is to be included in the new Armenian republic is as yet an unsettled question. A part of Armenia is in the possession of Russia, having been taken from Turkey some years ago, and here the Armenians are fighting for freedom from Bolshevik Russia. The rest of it, which has no definite boundaries, remained a part of Turkey, and just how much of this is to be set off will have to be settled by agreement with, or by force of arms against, the Turks. Here is a nice pickle to step into at the outset—a dispute with Russia and another with Turkey. It is Europe's job, not ours, to get together and settle the Armenian question. We have unsettled problems in the Mexican situation that have too long been shirked; they require our immediate attention. The first duty of our Government is to our own citizens, and until it can stop massacres of Americans by Mexicans its endeavors should be directed in that direction rather than to distant Armenia. As these views have been expressed by prominent Senators and Congressmen, and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations has reported a joint resolution respectfully refusing authority to accept the mandate over Armenia there appears to be little doubt that our Government will mind its own business and leave it to Europe to settle its disputes in its own way.

U. S. Mandate Over Mexico Possible

MEXICO was in a state of almost continuous revolution and anarchy until about forty-five years ago when President Diaz assumed control and soon brought order out of chaos. He was a man of great ability, absolute integrity and strong character, and made his administration respected at home and abroad. The terror of his swift and sure justice kept the lawless element in subjection and made life safe and property secure throughout the land, so that foreign capital dared to come in and develop the great natural resources of the country. He built the national railroads and lifted the national credit of Mexico out of bankruptcy to a position second only to that of the United States. During the thirty-five years that Diaz was undisputed ruler the population increased and the wealth and prosperity of the country grew amazingly. But ten years ago, when President Diaz began to show the weakening effect of old age, a wealthy and ambitious young man named Madero headed an insurrection to forcibly depose him. Some good but misguided people were among Madero's followers, but all the bad men and would-be brigands flocked to his standard of revolt against the man who had forced them to abandon the practice of their evil ways.

The insurrection was successful in so far as it drove Diaz out of the country and enabled Madero to make himself President. But his triumph was literally short lived, for he was assassinated within a few weeks by one of his own followers, General Huerta, who immediately set himself up as ruler of Mexico in place of his murdered chief. President Taft refused to recognize Huerta's government. President Wilson followed the same course and went further by sending our army and navy to Vera Cruz to help the other Mexican Insurrectos drive Huerta out of Mexico. Thereupon Carranza, another of the Insurrecto chiefs, set himself up as president in spite of President Wilson's protest and solemn threat that he would not recognize any man as president of Mexico who was not duly elected by the people. Nevertheless, Mr. Wilson did accord him official recognition and support when Carranza seemed to possess the force to sustain his position, though a number of Insurrecto leaders, notably Villa, denounced him as a usurper and waged a guerrilla warfare against him that has kept Mexico in continual turmoil until his recent fall. Like Madero he was murdered by his former supporters. He misgoverned as much of Mexico as came under his power and was a treacherous enemy to the United States, and a secret ally of the Kaiser. The leaders of the successful revolt against Carranza have chosen Adolfo De La Huerta (not the former president) to act as provisional president until a new government can be elected by the people. In this there is a ray of hope that a better element may control the destiny of Mexico.

Coincident with these latest events comes the report of the Senate Sub-Committee on Foreign Relations which has made a long and thorough investigation of affairs in Mexico. The report states that, as a result of the lawless condition that has prevailed since the beginning of the Madero revolution, 461 Americans and a large number of other foreigners have been killed in Mexico, and 126 Americans have been murdered on the American side of the Mexican border, while the property losses incurred by Americans in Mexico is placed at more than five hundred million dollars. The Committee expresses sympathy for the Mexican people who have been reduced to a deplorable state of poverty, distress and famine by the ravages of ten years of civil war that have killed a third of the population, and blames our Government's vacillating policy for allowing such a barbarous condition to exist at our very door. The report concludes by recommending that, unless a stable and responsible government capable and willing to restore law and order and to compensate American citizens for their losses suffered through Mexican disorders is set up by the Mexicans, it will be the duty of the United States to intervene in Mexico and police the country with our army and navy for the purpose of accomplishing that result in justice to our people and to other nations and in the interests of distracted Mexico.

Their Declaration of Independence

HAVERVILLE was divided against itself upon the broken engagement of Ralph Meredith and Alice Herbert.

Ralph was proprietor of the general store of Haverville and now and then made trips to Chicago for the purpose of stocking up. On the occasion of his last trip, he had gone to a cabaret and had danced with a rather gay little lady who patronized the place. There was nothing really wrong in the matter, nothing that he need blush for, and as a matter of fact he thought nothing of it after it was all over, looking upon it as a chance incident, for he had been taken to the place by one of the salesmen of a general merchandising firm who had invited him out to lunch.

The salesman claimed that he knew the young woman and Meredith had no reason to believe differently, so everything would have been well had not a rival agent happened in Haverville a few weeks later. This man mentioned that Mr. Meredith was quite another man when away from home, and then related the incident quite colorfully.

Honest as he was, Meredith admitted the dance, but some were pleased to put a different angle to the story, and as it was bandied about, the upshot was that Miss Herbert broke the engagement—and Haverville became divided.

"Alice Herbert did right in breaking her engagement with Ralph. Any man who will act as he did ought to be ashamed of himself. If she marries him, how can she ever trust him when he makes trips to the city?"

That was one premise.

"Ralph was a fool if he made up with Alice. The idea! Breaking her engagement just because he danced with a strange girl at a cabaret. If that's the way she trusts him, she'd better not marry him."

That was the other premise.

As each faction saw it, their favorite was doing right so long as he or she lived up to what the faction thought was right.

The couple were at the mercy of public opinion.

And there you are!

All this happened in early Spring. Summer approached, and soon all the boys of Haverville began to count the days to the glorious Fourth.

Haverville had not adopted the "Sane Fourth" idea. While everything may be said in favor of it, argue as you will, there is in every boy's heart that yearning for a slam-bang, old-fashioned Fourth of July. It is right and proper that for the sake of the casualty list which appears every morning of July Fifth, that the rest of mankind should be bereft of fireworks, but Haverville was a town that had not yet seen the error of its ways.

In the matter of fireworks, Ralph Meredith was incorrigible. Each year he always laid in a tremendous stock of nerve-racking, slam-banging pyrotechnics. As a boy they had been his passion, an incentive to patriotism, a reminder of those stirring days of the Revolution, and when the World War came on, he quickly found a place in the ranks. The smell of powder, the rockets and bombs that he saw in active service, all kindled his blood and gave him the sensation of viewing a never-ending Fourth of July.

Now he was home again, a civilian, dealing in general merchandise, but instead of having been cured, he determined upon a more elaborate celebration on Main Street than ever before for his exhibitions had always been the wonder and envy of every small boy in town.

Every day before his big show windows, the lads congregated, discussing with avidity, the wonderful display.

"Gee, I wonder if Mr. Meredith will let us shoot off some of the stuff?" exclaimed one with glowing eyes and hopeful heart.

"I bet he will. He always used to. Let's ask him," for just then Ralph came to the door of the store.

Ralph was a lovable chap. Rather slender in build, yet well set up, with dark eyes beaming from a face that was always smiling, sympathetic or kind, he unconsciously drew one to him. No one ever saw him in a passion or anything but good-tempered. However, he possessed a great deal of pride, pride in his character and in the reputation he enjoyed, and as he seemed to have inherited a natural inclination to right for right's sake, that pride of his had been hurt that Alice should suspect him of double-dealing. He loved her devotedly, but after all he was just human and as each has his little weakness, Meredith was not without his, and now he stood upon his pride and made no attempt to right the wrong that idle chatter and an honest confession had caused.

Ralph looked down the street, then smiled and winked knowingly at the cluster of urchins at the window.

"Hello, Mr. Meredith," came the chorus, and then one, braver than the rest, spoke up. "Are you going to let us shoot off some of the fireworks this year?"

"Surest thing you know," he responded, heartily. Then suddenly his smile faded.

He had espied Alice Herbert.

"If she would but give some sign," he murmured, half audibly. He leaned against the window sash, folded his arms and was lost in thought.

For some time the lads discussed the fireworks, then, some other attraction claiming them, they moved away—all but Stubby Hicks, the lad who asked the question with regard to the fireworks.

Stubby had heard Meredith sigh, but he gave no sign. In his heart, though, there was a wistful sympathy for the handsome young merchant, for Stubby knew of the broken engagement and mourned it. Personal reasons swayed Stubby to a certain extent for many had been the errands he had run for Meredith to Miss Herbert's home, since she lived on the street next to his and their back-yards joined. So it was convenient for him and there was always a dime and sometimes a quarter in it for him. But he mourned the matter for Meredith's sake, too, for he really boyishly loved the man who always was kind to him.

On several occasions, Stubby wanted to ask Mr. Meredith about the broken engagement and he dared it now.

"Mr. Meredith, why don't Miss Herbert talk to you any more?" he queried.

Meredith looked at him. The genuine camaraderie in the lad's eyes made him answer, half seriously, half in jest:

"Why, Miss Herbert thinks I did something dreadful while I was in Chicago the last time, that's why."

"What dreadful did you do?" Stubby asked. "You didn't steal or kill anybody, did you?"

Meredith, with tender compassion, laid a gentle hand on the lad's head.

"Let us hope that it will be a long time before you know any other of the evils men do in this world," he thought. But he replied: "No, but Miss Herbert chose to believe something which was not true."

"Well, why don't you go to her and tell her that it ain't so?" demanded Stubby.

"I can't, Stubby."

"Why? You ain't afraid?"

Meredith nodded his head. "I am," he returned.

"And you was a soldier!" exclaimed the lad with disgust.

Meredith laughed merrily, then he quieted down.

"Yes, in spite of having been a soldier. But, Stubby, there are some things which are harder to face than gunpowder, and some things harder to conquer than an enemy. Some day when you are a man, you'll understand."

Stubby wondered what Meredith meant and deeply pondered it. What could be harder to face than gunpowder or an enemy? He thought about it, but gave it up. Grown people were so queer. Why didn't they fight things out like boys did on the street and be good friends again instead of scowling at each other forever and ever? Why didn't Mr. Meredith go and tell Miss Herbert that he didn't do anything dreadful? She ought to believe him, when he said he didn't!

Thus his innocent boyish mind meditated upon the matter until it neared bedtime, and he decided to go home.

Before he went into the house, however, he climbed to the loft of the big barn (which now did service as a garage) to look over his stock of fireworks. Stubby had a considerable layout, for he was not a poor lad—his father was one of the well-to-do men of Haverville. Mr. Hicks, however, did not spoil his son with too much spending money, but allowed Stubby to earn whatever he could.

Stubby lit a bit of candle and then lovingly fingered the precious things, the sky-rockets, the Roman candles, cannon-crackers, pin-wheels and the rest of the conglomeration.

He meant to be cautious. Perhaps he was; perhaps he wasn't. Somehow or other, he couldn't explain how, that light connected with the fuse of a sky-rocket. There was a sudden trailing s-s-s-s-z which ended in a gentle "tock" and he saw the rocket sail through the big loft doorway and right across intervening space into the open window of Alice Herbert's home!

In horror, Stubby sprang up and beat out the sparks which lay about. But his subsiding terror again took an upward bound when he saw that the dainty curtains which hung in Miss Herbert's windows were burning.

With a bound, he almost fell down the loft ladder and rushed across the intervening space and scaling a tree, he swung himself into Miss Herbert's room. The flames were licking about and spreading to the other curtains, but with his wits about him, he seized a small rug and again beat about and here too he succeeded in extinguishing the fire.

So busy was he that he did not notice Miss Herbert standing at the door until she said in a gentle voice:

"That was nobly done, Stubby."

Stubby's cheeks burned as he stood abashed before the sweet gray eyes. He blurted out:

"'Twasn't, Miss Herbert. It was my fault. My sky-rocket got set off some way and shot right 'cross from our barn into your window."

"Yes, it was, Stubby," she reiterated. "And more so since you might have taken the glory of putting out the fire without revealing yourself as the cause. That is a moral courage that is greater even than meeting an enemy—and we all do not possess it," she finished as an afterthought.

Stubby was impressed with her words.

"Why!" he exclaimed, "that's something like what Mr. Meredith said tonight. He said something about not being afraid to face gun-powder but was afraid to do something else."

"He said that?" Miss Herbert observed, and there was someting in her tone that made Stubby feel as if he ought not have repeated Mr. Meredith's words. So he nodded but said no more.

Miss Herbert then dismissed him and he went home and to bed.

The next evening found him with the rest of the congregation before Meredith's store. After a bit, he joined Meredith as he often did, and told him of the incident and naturally, of what Miss Herbert had said.

Meredith listened.

"Stubby," he began, with a sudden determination in his voice, "will you see that Miss Herbert comes to the celebration on the Fourth of July? I'm sure she'll accept your escort."

"Sure," said Stubby.

"All right. Because I shall have a 'set piece' which I want her to see," Meredith said.

The next day Mr. Meredith went to Chicago and shortly before the Fourth, some mysterious freight was delivered.

Finally the long awaited day came.

From dawn there was a smell of powder in the air. All the lads of Haverville were up betimes. The small crackers snapped and the air was punctuated with long rolling booms as giant cannon crackers were ignited.

The sun crawled up to the zenith and looked down upon a town in holiday array for flags and bunting floated everywhere.

Toward afternoon, most supplies were exhausted and a little quietus came upon the town, broken now and then by a distant boom. The time then was beguiled by the young folks with ice cream, lemonade and like cooling refreshment while they dwelt in blissful anticipation of the glories soon to be shown.

Dusk advanced and soon was illuminated by soaring rockets and popping Roman candles and then as the darkness deepened, great colored lights of blue, green and red lit up and made everyday things objects of wonder.

When dark night had fallen, most of the townspeople gathered in Main Street near Meredith's store from which Mr. Meredith had taken all his surplus stock for the edification of the youngsters.

What a time they had! Meredith invited crowds of youngsters before the store and placed Roman candles in their hands, and they twirled away merrily as the bright globes of fire left the narrow tubes. Among the very little folks he distributed the seemingly indistinguishable "sparklers." When these were finally exhausted, the youngsters were shooed away to a safe distance and great rockets, which flew up into the air with a roar like a steam engine tearing away from the depot, were set off. Then came the wonderful bombs, the "flower pots," etc., and then the "set pieces" of war heroes in colored fire were ignited.

Meredith moved among those helping him to set off the pyrotechnical display with a sense of reliability that was comforting. But when he approached the final "set piece" one might have noticed that his hand trembled just a little.

He applied the torch. There was a sudden sizz, then the powder began to burn and the outline of a man and a girl, the man in the act of kissing her, formed. And below in letters of colored fire burned the words:

"I CARE NOT WHAT THEY SAY NOR WHAT THEY MAY HAVE SAID. THIS IS MY DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE."

There was a great round of applause and laughter as the gathered audience looked upon the piece. They all thought it a bit of comedy—a new comedy angle to the immortal words, "Declaration of Independence."

For some time it flared and burned, the colored fire constantly changing hue, then the powder burned low; one after another the sparks extinguished until only here and there bits of fire flamed up as they ignited stray bits of powder.

Then came a succession of rockets and bombs which made the heavens golden, and the exhibition was finished.

A final cheer went up and all the lads crowded around their hero. He answered their numerous questions haphazardly, but when he got to Stubby he asked whether he had fulfilled his promise. Stubby replied:

"Oh, yes. But I told my daddy to take her home because I want to stay with the boys yet."

Meredith laughed, and as he saw no sign of Miss Herbert, he started for her home.

He found her on the porch where Mr. Hicks and his wife had just set her down. She was leaning against a pillar. A shaft of light from the open window touched up her face. Her eyes were thoughtful.

"Alice," he called softly, "Alice."

She did not repulse him. He grew bolder.

"Alice," he repeated again. "Alice. You understood? You got my message? You were not offended?"

She turned her head so that her face was in the shadow. Then she said:

"I did not realize until now the necessity of a Declaration of Independence—to absolve myself from all allegiance to—public opinion. You have made yours. It was a fiery declaration," she punned.

Her words encouraged him.

"You, too, will make a declaration—and forgive me?"

She hesitated a moment.

"I forgave you almost immediately after I had condemned you, because I knew I was wrong and had been influenced only by public opinion."

"I, too, had been foolishly swayed that way and allowed my pride to stand in my way. But we shall not listen to any talk further, shall we?"

"We have voiced our Declaration of Independence," she said.

That was a sufficient answer.

With a bound he sprang up the steps with arms extended. She ran to him, one arm under his, the other resting on his breast and shoulder.

"You weren't as brave as Stubby," she chided. "He wasn't afraid to acknowledge that he nearly set the house on fire."

"The little trump!" Meredith exclaimed. "It was he who first gave me courage to make my declaration," and he renewed his clasp on his re-won treasure.

Reported Missing in Action

PART II.

HE offered honorable marriage but he insisted on forcing himself into the presence of the two helpless women.

It was only the constant threat of the older woman of retaliation on the part of her countrymen in case they were not treated as honorable prisoners of war that kept him at his distance; and further, the man was actually in love with the beautiful American girl, and had a sort of sense of honor after a fashion.

"You may capture Paris," said Mrs. Joyce, always in a dignified manner, "and you may even capture the channel ports and invade London perhaps. But the United States is a vast and powerful country, and she cannot be defeated. She will come overseas in greater and greater numbers. You might as well try to stop Niagara as to stop her; and some day she will defeat you—will crush your Fatherland, and then—then if you have not treated us two as ladies, they, our brothers and fathers, will come to take their revenge."

She little knew how nearly she was guessing the truth; but yet the rising respect of the German officer seemed a thermometer of American victories in the field. In August the two women suffered less annoyance than in June or July. In October, they were permitted the freedom of the village, and the officer, who had been stationed there while a wound was healing, was hurried with all his men to the front. There were no more men and very few young boys left in the town.

Then in November it came suddenly, the debacle, the complete downfall of the Germans. The two women did not hear of the armistice, but got their news or a strong surmise of it all in a tragic fashion. On November fourteenth, the officer, Major Kampfinfelt, came to them by night and without warning.

"Get ready for a long journey," he ordered. "At midnight you shall get into my automobile for a journey into the interior."

"I demand the right to talk with the mayor first," asserted Mrs. Joyce.

She was permitted to talk with the mayor, but he only shrugged his shoulders and said he could do nothing. They must do as the major said. The two women, wholly unarmed and at the mercy of the man who commanded them, got into his auto. They were whirled across the country. Two days later they arrived at a castle, they could not guess where. They had not been permitted to ask any questions, and they could not speak the language. But by day they saw hundreds of men in uniform but without arms, and guessed that something momentous had taken place. They believed that there was a revolution in Germany.

At the castle, they were given an elegant suite of rooms, and two women servants were placed at their command. Major Kampfinfelt renewed his addresses to Jewell, but always in the most entreating and respectful tones. It was a battle of wits between him and the girl and between him and the older woman. The two tried to bribe the servants to tell them the state of things in Germany, but it was of no use. Day after day and week after week they remained in gilded captivity ignorant of all that was passing around them.

It was at this time that the mind of Jewell reverted oftener and oftener to Harold. She had never ceased to believe that when he was found he would be found alive. She dwelt upon him so constantly that he seemed to her like a third member of their party.

Came Christmas, a sad Christmas indeed for the two prisoners. The major tried to do everything he could to make the day a glorious success. He ordered a grand dinner, but besides two other officers who seemed to be under his orders no guests were present except them and the old housekeeper.

At dinner he proposed a toast: "Here is to the Madame Joyce and to the beautiful Mademoiselle Joyce, who one week from today shall be my bride. I swear it. On New Year's Day she shall be mine."

"On New Year's Day?" inquired Mrs. Joyce in her usual dignified tone. "But why, my dear major, do you not invite more of your friends to the festivities? Why, pray, are you here, far from the firing line? Is it that the Vaterland no longer needs your service? You say you have won against our allies. Then why be so secret about this wedding,—why not announce it to all the world? I think your country has broken up into revolutionary groups, and that you are hiding in your castle from those who would execute you if they had you at Berlin. Is it not true, what I say?"

At this speech the major flew into a typical German rage.

"Drag those two women out of here and put them in the dungeon, keep on bread and water. I have wooed like a gentleman and they cannot understand that. Vell then, I shall show them I am here all powerful. I vill show them if I am a revolutionary, if I am in hiding." He gave an order in German, and three common footmen in soldier uniforms leaped forward and dragged the two frightened women from the room.

In the cell, a damp cell in the basement of the castle to which they were confined, they were literally fed upon bread and water, and every day the major sent a mock polite note asking Jewell if she would not honor him by becoming his wife, but always reminding her in brutal terms that on New Year's Day she should become such.

"There is nothing for it but to pray for deliverance," said the girl. "That and the hunger strike for me. You eat my portion, Mother, and keep up your strength so you can demand revenge for me. I—I—perhaps will be dead by New Year's Eve. I have lived too long already."

So the girl ate nothing and daily became weaker. Then came New Year's Eve and the two spent the entire night in prayer.

At dawn of New Year's Day, as they two sat shivering in their cell they suddenly heard the sound of firing.

"Hark," said Mother Joyce. "It is as I surmised. He is a member of a revolutionary group and his enemies are attacking."

Her words were cut short. Suddenly the cell door was flung open. The major, haggard, perspiring, his hair and clothing in wild disarray, stood before them.

"You spoke the truth on Christmas Day," he panted. "My country is defeated. You spoke the truth all along with your Niagara talk. The Americans have long since come. I was in hiding, but not as a revolutionary, always I am true to the Kaiser. Now they think to rout me out. But I swear I will not be cheated of my prey. When I go, you two go with me. Come."

The two trembling women were dragged from the cell and forced into the automobile once more.

"Today you marry me, understand?" said the excited major, thrusting his unshaven face into Jewell's. "Kiss me. You have never done so. You shall kiss me vonce before ve die together."

He said no more. There was a shout. "Yar-ar-ar," a prolonged, demoniac yell. Then they saw such a sight. A mob of pale men, white almost as the field of snow across which they ran, came toward where the auto stood in the great parade ground before the castle gate.

"Yar-ah-ah." Their rifles were at the ready. But not a shot was fired as they bore down in a great lessening semicircle toward the auto. The chauffeur and the soldiers in attendance upon the major fled back toward the castle gate. Then the shots began to patter round them, a staccatto of sharp sound on the frosty air.

"They are Americans, Americans and English, I do believe," cried Mrs. Joyce.

The major followed the example of his men and leaped from the car and started at a run. He was shot squarely in the back.

In another moment the attackers had come up. Then such a sight as the two women saw! The leaders were ex-prisoners one and all, and following them and helping were a number of German soldiers. And in the forefront, running like mad in spite of his weakened condition, was Harold Joyce.

"Alive!" cried Jewell, and fainted dead away to be caught in his encircling arms.

"Yes, alive," cried Harold. "The hope of this reunion has kept me alive. But what a meeting! Only three days ago, we, who have been buried twenty miles from here ignorant of everything, were released by these revolutionaries. Only last night we heard that you two were buried here. We made a forced march all night, and—here we are—and, Mother, oh, Mother, the war is over, and we are reunited at last."

The Champion Bonehead

THE world's champion bonehead has been discovered. He lived about 3,000,000 B. C. in the vicinity of what is known as Red River, South Alberta, Canada. In the towering cliffs above the river gorge a remarkable collection of ancient fossil remains of reptilians has been discovered. Among them is a scientific mystery, a crested dinosaur. It is an herbivorous monster that waded in the Cretaceous marshes some 3,000,000 years ago. Not only was its every bone imbedded in the rock, but most of its hide, which beats the record of the Siberian mammoth of 50,000 years ago, with skin preserved in ice.

He was thirty-five feet long. When standing on his hind bird-like feet he could lift his head fifteen feet above ground and browse on tree foliage, practically his sole occupation. His structure was light and froglike. On his head was a great crest. His skull was shaped like a Corinthian helmet, and, as it was evidently not meant for thinking, may have been used as a battering ram, like that of a goat now, to butt its enemies, and next to break down trees to get at their juicy leaves.

The tall rounded skull stood thirty inches high above the neck and had a diameter of forty inches. Attached to it was a huge duck bill some twenty-seven inches long. In the big jaws were seventy rows of teeth, arranged in batteries, totaling over two thousand teeth. The animal was covered with plate scales, some round and some square, averaging one and one half inches long and one and a quarter inches wide.

This monster was four times as long and twice as tall as the biggest elephant that ever lived. And he never had an idea.

Measuring the Earth

The circumference of the earth is measured in the following manner: Suppose two astronomers, A and B, stationed on the same meridian or line, a certain distance apart, should make careful observations of a star the exact instant it crossed the meridian, and A should find it 16 degrees south of the zenith or point directly overhead, and B, who is 415 miles south of A, should find it only 10 degrees south of the zenith, there would then be a difference of six degrees between the two places; and, as they are 415 miles apart, one degree must be one sixteenth of 415 or 69 1-6 miles.

Now if one degree is the 360th part of the earth's circumference, and expressed in miles equals 69 1-6, then the whole circumference must be 360 times that or 24,900 miles. If it were possible for a train going 50 miles an hour to travel in a straight line around the earth, it could complete the circuit in 20 days and 18 hours.

Driven Apart

"A reg'lar little spitfire Mr. Preston" said Marm Kinney.

"You would interfere with me, Would you?" he hissed.

"Miss Lee!" he cried "What has happened?"

A moment later and he was swallowed up in the blackness

CHAPTER XXXII.

A PRISONER.

BERYL revived from her swoon as from some sense-destroying trance. When her thoughts became active, even before she opened her eyes, a moan of anguish burst from her lips. Neil was not there—had never been there! Berdyne had wrought this wicked treachery. She would have longed to die, but that her great love for Neil strove in her breast and inspired her to live—to live, not for herself alone, but for him.

And then Tonita, dear, unselfish Tonita! She, also, had been caught in that net of deceit. Beryl must struggle to live for her sake as well.

Then, under the spell of these thoughts, the great violet eyes opened and gazed fearfully around. Beryl was lying on a couch, and the old crone, feasting her eyes on the girl's perfect beauty—apparently intensified by her pallor and distress—was crouching near. Berdyne was not to be seen.

"Where—where is that monster?" cried Beryl, starting up.

"There, now, my little queen o' hearts!" croaked the old woman, "don't talk that way about your rich an' handsome lover——"

"He is not my lover!" Beryl almost screamed. "I hate and loathe him!" She ran to the door and wrenched at the knob with trembling hands. The door was still locked. Distraught with a feeling of abject helplessness, she turned to the old crone. "You are a woman!" she implored. "Surely you have a heart to pity me in my distress? Oh, let me go, and Heaven will reward you!"

"I couldn't let ye go if I wanted to, my pretty blossom," the hag returned. "I was jest outside the door, an' the minute ye went into that faint, Mr. Preston called me right in. I rubbed yer temples and yer teeny hands, an' brought ye to. Calm yourself now, do! Any girl ought to be proud o' makin' a conquest o' Mr. Preston."

"He is not Mr. Preston!" cried Beryl, stamping her little foot. "He is a wicked scoundrel, and his name is Berdyne! If you do not let me leave this house at once," she added, "you will rue the aid you are giving that villain! I shall appeal to the officers of the law——"

"Ha, ha, ha!" came a low, taunting laugh. Another moment, and Nicholas Berdyne, his handsome malignant face still flushed with triumph, stepped from behind a curtain draping an arch that led to another room. "So you would appeal to officers of the law, my girl? You would have your trouble for your pains, if you did. See those bars at the window? Note them well; observe their massive strength. Marm Kinney, who owns this house, allows people to come here and smoke opium; and the windows are secured so that if frenzy comes upon the opium smokers, they cannot fling themselves to the ground. This is a safe nest for you, my darling, until such time as I can remove you to the yacht which I have waiting for us off Sausalito."

The term of endearment which he made use of in his mocking way brought a gasp of impotent anger to Beryl's lips.

"You will be sorely punished for this!" cried Beryl, her eyes flashing as they sought the sloe-black orbs of the master scoundrel. "My husband will find me, and you cannot escape his vengeance!"

Berdyne stepped to the entrance and pushed the key into the lock. With a wild cry, Beryl dashed for the door. Before she had gone far the hag caught her and threw her with cruel force into a chair.

"A re'lar little spitfire, Mr. Preston," said Marm Kinney.

"Leave us!" scowled Berdyne. "Be quick!"

The door opened and closed; and when the scoundrel again faced his captive they two were alone together.

"Understand me, once for all, my lady," said he, his tones palpitating with passion, "I am not to be trifled with. Escape from this room is impossible, and you may as well content yourself to remain in my power. Tonight a carriage will call here, and you and I will be taken to a launch; we will then proceed across the bay to Sausalito, board the Gloriana, and put to sea. Yield to my desires, become my wife, and all will be well. I will do all a man can to make you happy. You do not love me now, but in time——"

"Oh, cease this insulting language!" cried Beryl. "I am the bride of Neil Preston, who will come for me, and take me——"

"Your old lover will not come for you," interrupted Berdyne. "You were a bride, if all I hear is true—the bride of an hour. Do not delude yourself with false hopes."

There was that about the man which filled Beryl with the conviction that he was insane. How could any one but a madman do the terrible things that he had done, and was doing? Her fears were in no wise calmed by the reflection, but rather increased.

"What do you mean?" she asked, starting from her chair.

"I mean that your husband is dead!" he brutally answered.

"No, no, no!" she cried, clasping her hands. "It is not true; it cannot be true!"

Her anguish, which seemed to be crushing her frail form down before him, brought a demoniacal smile to his lips.

"I shall prove it to you, my Beryl, before we leave this house," he answered. "You do not know how much I have at stake in this matter; and you do not know how resourceful I can be when not only my happiness but my fortune hangs in the balance."

"Your despicable plans will never succeed!" she rejoined, calming her tortured feelings with a fierce effort. "If necessary, I will foil them by taking my own life!"

She said this with so much quiet determination—as though all her wrongs had centered in that one resolve—that Berdyne was startled.

"What has happened to my friend who came to this house with me?" demanded Beryl. "Your evil plots can have nothing to do with her."

"Nothing whatever," returned Berdyne, with an insolent smile, "but the fact that she accompanied you here makes it necessary for us to detain her. Perhaps, too, you would like a companion of your own sex on our yachting trip? If so, although it will inconvenience me somewhat, we will take your friend along."

In that hour of trial, in that supreme moment when all seemed lost, it was wonderful what a fund of desperate courage came to the aid of the poor, persecuted girl. As she stood before the man, more beautiful and more alluring than he had ever seen her, her very defiance awed him and held him at bay.

"I shall take no yachting trip with you," said Beryl, "nor shall I remain in this house for very long. When I leave, either you will set me free, and thereby save yourself, or another will fly to my relief, and you will pay for your wickedness to the uttermost. You tell me," she added, with fiery words, "that my husband is dead, and I answer that you speak falsely! Between you and me, Nicholas Berdyne, there is a gulf you cannot pass! I am safe, for the Power that protects the pure and the innocent is ranged on my side and will protect me from you!"

Like some prophetess of old, she raised one of her small white hands and leveled a finger at him.

"Have a care, Nicholas Berdyne!" she said deliberately, "for your sinful soul is hovering on the brink of eternity! Go!" and she swerved her pointing finger imperiously toward the door. "If this wretched place is to be my prison, let it be so. If you are content to wait and abide what the future has in store, so am I!"

There was a moment's silence, broken finally by a scornful, half-hearted laugh from the man.

"You are disposed to be tragic, I see," he sneeringly returned, "but I am not to be frightened by your heroics. Here you are, and here you shall stay until nightfall. This is an obscure spot, and I feel perfectly safe from outside interference; nevertheless, you will be constantly watched. If you attempt to scream, we may find it necessary to bind you and smother your voice with a bandage."

He passed to the door, gave her one swift, menacing look, then let himself into the hall. The door closed, the key turned in the lock, and she heard his retreating steps in the hall and on the stairs.

When the steps had died away into silence, a moaning cry came from her, and she threw herself upon the couch.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

NOT IN THE RECKONING.

Tonita, drawn into this web of deceit by her friendship for Beryl, had no sooner entered the room to which she was directed by Marm Kinney than she was quickly seized by Gorsline and Hargreaves. While one clasped a rude hand over her tender lips to prevent outcry, the other grasped her hands so that they could not help her in her struggles. Then she was dragged to a chair, cords were brought, and her delicate limbs were firmly secured to the framework.

The outrageous act was quickly done; so quickly that Tonita was taken at a disadvantage from pure bewilderment. Then it flashed over her that again had Beryl been lured into the power of her foes. Tonita was wild with rage and indignation, yet thinking more of her hapless friend than she did of herself. While a cloth was being bound over her lips, she managed to give vent to the stifled scream which Beryl had heard. When all was done, and the two scoundrels drew away, she was entirely helpless.

"She's a rare one for a greaser," remarked Gorsline, shooting a look of bold admiration at the captive. "So help me, if I had any idea of gittin' spliced, I reckon I could go a good ways farther an' fare a heap worse."

"What's the use of tormenting her?" spoke up Hargreaves. "We've got her where she can't do any harm, and that's enough."

The valet might have been an honest man had he served a different master. He was not in love with the work that had fallen to him, but he was in the grip of Berdyne, and it was to his interest to do his master's bidding.

"I'll not muzzle myself to please you, or any man!" flared Gorsline. "If I want to make remarks about the gal's good looks, I'll do it; and if I want to make love to her, I'll do that, too. Keep your remarks to yourself, Hargreaves. You size up a good deal like Trenwyck; an' I'll have a bone to pick with him one o' these days."

There was a bottle of whiskey on the table, set out for Gorsline's use by Marm Kinney when she served Berdyne the evening before. Gorsline poured himself a drink and tossed it off at a gulp. Hargreaves, not caring to have a clash with his confederate, withdrew himself to the couch at the other side of the room. While he sat there he kept vigilant watch of Gorsline's actions.

Tonita, unable to implore or threaten or question the two men, had to bear her apprehensions on Beryl's account as best she could. What a bitter, bitter disappointment this would prove for poor, fated Beryl.

As she sat in the chair to which she had been secured, she strained her ears to hear as much as possible of what was taking place above. The grating of a key came to her, and she heard Berdyne call out: "This way, Marm Kinney! The girl has swooned!"

Then the door was closed again, and Tonita's heart sank with its weight of fear. The slow minutes dragged by. Gorsline took a chair, tilted it against the wall behind him, and sat there, his head bowed. Occasionally he would lift his head to throw a leering glance of admiration at the helpless girl, or a look of anger at Hargreaves.

Instinctively, the girl knew that Hargreaves would prevent any insulting treatment on the part of Gorsline. Although a prisoner, yet Tonita felt that she was comparatively safe. It was about Beryl that this net had been woven; she was the one for whom alarm and anxiety must be felt.

Presently voices were once more heard from the second floor; Beryl's voice and the old woman's. This much Tonita knew, although it was impossible to distinguish what was said. Then, in a little while, came the voice of Berdyne. The door opened and closed again, and Marm Kinney descended the stairs and entered the room.

"A purty vixen!" mumbled Marm Kinney, with a jerk of her head in the direction of the upper floor; "but she's found her match in Preston or Berdyne or whatever ye call him. He'll tame her! Trust him to make her see things as he wants them!"

She drew close and stood surveying Tonita.

"Another fine bird!" the hag cackled. "They seem to be flyin' in pairs about the eagle's nest. Did she fight much?" and Marm Kinney turned to Gorsline.

"She hadn't time," scowled Gorsline; "we was too quick for her. Before she fairly knew what had happened, we had her in the chair with a rope about her pretty ankles and another around her small wrists. To my thinkin'," he added, "she's a fairer prize than t'other one."

"Oh, you men, you men!" muttered the hag, moving off to a chair, and beginning to roll a cigarette.

Tonita paid little heed to these remarks. She was straining her ears to hear what was going on overhead. Beryl's voice was borne to her ears, calm, even, defiant. The Mexicana's heart leaped in her bosom. Beryl was meeting her trying ordeal with courage, and how Tonita longed to be at her side, to cheer and strengthen her.

The minutes passed, and Berdyne, scowling blackly, descended the stairs and entered the room. He was about to speak, but before a word could pass his lips, a loud rap fell on the door.

Everyone in the room, with the exception, of course, of Tonita, gave a startled jump. Significant glances were exchanged.

"Go," said Berdyne sharply to Marm Kinney, and see who is there!" He turned to Gorsline as the old woman shuffled out of the room. "If it's Preston," he hissed, "be ready for him, both of you!"

"I'll be ready for him, never fear!" growled Gorsline, between his teeth.

Presently Marm Kinney returned.

"It's a woman," said she, "an' she asked for Mr. Preston."

"A woman!" A puzzled look crossed Berdyne's angry face. "What woman could be coming here to find Preston? Did she give any name?"

"No."

"What does she look like?"

"She wears a heavy veil, an' I couldn't see. Shall I bring her in?"

Marm Kinney half started back toward the hall.

"I'll go to the door myself!" growled Berdyne. "Stay here, all of you."

He whirled on his heel and passed out into the hall. Opening the door, he beheld the strange caller, just as described by Marm Kinney. Her face was covered with a black veil, so that it could not be seen.

"Do you want to see Mr. Preston?" asked Berdyne.

"Are you Neil Preston?" came the response, in a voice that was plainly disguised.

"Yes," Berdyne answered.

The woman pushed through the doorway. Berdyne fell back before her, but barred her path to the room where Tonita was held captive.

"I felt positive there was something wrong with that notice I saw posted up in Golden Gate Park," came the woman's ringing voice, this time with no attempt at disguise. "You are up to your old tricks, Nicholas Berdyne, but you have reckoned without me!"

The veil was torn aside. An imprecation of dismay fell from Berdyne, and he recoiled.

"Irma!" he cried.

"Yes, Irma!" mocked the woman.

In a twinkling, Berdyne's hand was thrust under his coat. When it showed again there was a revolver gripped in his tense fingers.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

TREACHERY.

Berdyne had, indeed, reckoned without Irma Lee! A bolt from a clear sky could not have surprised him more than her sudden appearance on the scene. Throughout all her persistent interference with Berdyne's plans, the woman had so skilfully concealed her movements that not the slightest breath of suspicion had reached him. Now, as by the sudden lifting of a curtain, he understood many things that had before been dark.

Who was it that could have implanted the seed of mistrust in Beryl Grayson's mind, if not Irma? Who was it that had maneuvered to let Preston know that Beryl was hidden away at Sunset Ranch, if not Irma? Who was it that had managed to help the girl out of that Sutter Street house, if not Irma? Here, then, was the one person who had constantly marred Berdyne's plans and all but brought them to naught. Here, too, at the very climax of his efforts, she had come to him.

His love—if the term may be used in connection with such a man—and his fortune hung upon his power over Beryl, and the success or failure of his designs. These things meant more to Berdyne than life itself, more than Preston's life, or Irma's.

The far-reaching effect of those slips he had caused to be posted in the various refugee camps was coming home to the cunning and reckless plotter. As he stood gazing at Irma, her power to vex and turn aside his schemes loomed large in his eyes. Guile and trickery flew to his aid; although he inwardly raged, yet he forced a smile of seeming pleasure, and put away the weapon which, on the impulse of the moment, he had drawn from his pocket.

"Well," he muttered, "this is, indeed, a surprise, my girl. Why, I thought you were in Denver."

She was expecting fierce words, brutal actions. His mood worried and perplexed her.

"Could I remain idly in Denver when the man I love is seeking to woo and win another?" she flashed. "Do you think I have no heart, and that I can forget all that has passed between us, and yield you up calmly and without a pang? If you think so, Nicholas Berdyne, you are woefully mistaken. You belong to me, and I shall have you—or no one!"

"Let us go in here," said he, opening a door leading to a room in the front part of the house. "We can talk with more privacy, and this is a matter entirely between ourselves."

She shot a suspicious look at him, but his plausible manner took her off her guard. She passed into the room, and he followed her.

"Who else is there in this house besides ourselves?" she demanded.

"As yet," he lied, "there is none but ourselves and the old hag who owns it. But she has sharp ears."

"You put up those notices in the parks and squares, didn't you?" she inquired.

"Yes."

"I imagined as much!" she cried, with jealous fury. "You would cast me aside for this wax doll, this baby-faced creature who hates and despises you! But I——"

He indulged in a low laugh.

"Do you think that for a moment, Irma? Is it possible that you imagine, for one fleeting instant, that I would be so base as to throw you over for this young girl? Bah! I thought you had more confidence in me than that."

"But you intercepted letters that came to her at Denver from her lover!" exclaimed Irma, in an exasperated voice. "I saw some of them in the desk in your Denver office."

He frowned darkly; but the frown disappeared as quickly as it had come.

"But that is not all," she went on; "for you put yourself out of the way to be nice to the girl. For anything I know, you had her taken in at Sunset Ranch. And I have it on good authority that you hired Gorsline to go to her with a lie about her lover's death. Why did you do all these things, Nicholas Berdyne? You have been heartless in your treatment of me, too. What inference was I to draw?"

"As you put it, Irma," said he blandly, "it does look as though I was praying treacherous to you. And yet, the explanation is simple when you have fully realized one point."

"What is that?"

"I had not thought to speak of this to any one, for it is a subject in which my fortune is concerned. But I see I must be frank with you. Every dollar I have, Irma, could, under certain circumstances, be taken from me by this young girl. I have realized it for months; so I have been more than kind to her, in order that I might safeguard my interests.

"At the time of the earthquake and fire, I had a trunkful of extremely important papers in my room in a Frisco hotel. An attempt was made to get this trunk, which was in charge of my man Hargreaves, away from the hotel. The trunk, with many others, was abandoned in the street; a falling wall wrecked the trunk and scattered the papers. Preston—and a curse on my unlucky stars for bringing him there!—found the trunk and secured a packet of papers. Hargreaves saw him turn the trick, and reported it to me. Do you know what that means, Irma? It means that, unless I can get that packet of papers from Preston, I am a ruined man; all my wealth will be swept away!"

Irma Lee had listened with intense wonder. Could it be, after all, that her jealousy had led her to do Berdyne a wrong? His plausible manner deceived her—even her, who knew him so well!

"How do you intend to secure this valuable packet, Nick?" she asked, her voice softening.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, CARE COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

"THE time hath come," the walrus said, "to talk of many things"—but not of "shoes and ships and sealing wax and cabbages and kings," though they are all worthy of discussion, but of a matter or two that should be explained.

Firstly—only this isn't to be a sermon—names and addresses of the writers of letters in the Sisters' Corner are not given to anyone, not even when a stamped envelope is sent. For instance, a woman from a little town in, say, Texas, writes to this Corner and in her letter tells a part of her life or family troubles that not even her dearest friend is aware of, and asks for advice. To her are forwarded many letters of sympathy and also comes many requests for her address, some reading like this: "Please send me So-and-So's address. I think I know her." Well-meaning souls but terribly inquisitive, and they don't get the address.

But these requests are forwarded to the person in question and whether they are answered or not depends upon the person to whom they were sent. COMFORT has done its duty in the matter and this explanation is made in answer to the complaints received daily. You will agree with me, I know, that this is the only fair way to do.

Secondly—I have no personal likes or dislikes among the sisters—I like all of you—but when I receive a letter like this, "if there isn't anything helpful or interesting in this letter I won't mind if it isn't printed," and another, "I hope you will be more favorably inclined when you read this letter than you were when you read my other two; you didn't print them," well, I leave it to you sisters, which would make you feel the better? All the letters are interesting, to me, but I endeavor to select for print the ones that will be most helpful and interesting to the majority of readers and with the scarcity of print paper I have dozens and dozens of worthwhile letters that there isn't room for. I wish there were; in fact, I'd like to have at least half of our paper for our letters and then that wouldn't be space enough. So now please don't think I have a personal grudge against you if your letter isn't printed but try again.—Ed.

GRIFTON, N. C.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

COMFORT is a great help to me and I never pick up the paper without getting some good advice from it. I always try the recipes and find them very good. Most of all I enjoy the letters from the sisters telling how to bring up children. We have one little daughter, one year and a half old. She has been walking about four months and is a comfort to us. Her name is Nannie May. I am sending her picture and if there is space for it in COMFORT I should like to see it there.

We live in a prosperous community and have splendid neighbors; we are one mile from the railroad.

My husband is one of the good men of whom we read. We have been married three years and he is as kind and loving as at first. Sisters, it is the way you start that makes them what they are.

Love to all. MRS. JESSIE WADE.

CALIFORNIA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Mrs. Wheeler, by all means tell your children they are adopted. I think the best time would be just before they start to school. My aunt and uncle adopted a baby boy when he was only a few days old but never told him he wasn't their own child. Then when he was seven years old and commenced school, some girls, between fifteen and seventeen years of age, told the little fellow that Mr. and Mrs. ———— were not his parents and that he had been taken from a home when he was a baby. He came home that night and threw himself into his mother's arms and sobbingly told her

OF all the delightful uncertainties of life—and preserving—jelly making seems to lead and we so often hear the questions, "Why doesn't my jelly harden?" or, "What makes my jelly candy?" from housewives, experienced as well as inexperienced. The easiest way to answer this is to explain in a perfectly knowing manner that the fruit juice and sugar were cooked too long a time or that the trouble was in the condition of the fruit. Undoubtedly this answer is correct, so far as it goes, but it doesn't help the inquirer or tend to improve her disposition. If she has followed the same rule before, with good results, she wants to know what caused this particular failure, and how to prevent its recurrence.

To give the entire process of jelly making would involve much time and space so this explanation will be brief.

In ripe, or nearly ripe, fruit, along with water, flavors, vegetable acids and sugar is found a substance called pectin, a carbohydrate similar to starch. When equal quantities of fruit juice and sugar are combined and heated to the boiling point for a few minutes this pectin in the fruit gelatinizes the mass. Therefore, the point to be considered is when pectin is at its best which is when the fruit is just ripe or a little before. Pectose and pectase exist in the unripe fruit and as the fruit ripens the pectase acts upon the insoluble pectase, changing it into pectin, which is soluble. If the jelly is cooked too long or the fruit juice ferments, the pectin loses its power of gelatinizing, so the fruit in addition to being fresh should be just ripe or a little underripe and the sugar and juice should not be boiled too long. Hard boiling causes jelly to crystallize. When the syrup is boiled rapidly, particles of it are thrown on the upper part of the preserving kettle where they form crystals which are stirred into the syrup and cause it to crystallize. The only safe and sure way is to use a syrup gauge, which should register 25 degrees, no matter what kind of fruit is used.

APPLE JELLY.—Stem, wash and wipe the apples carefully, taking care to clean the blossom end thoroughly. Cut into quarters and put in the preserving kettle. Merely cover with cold water and cook slowly till the apples are soft and clear. Strain and proceed as in currant jelly.

Crab Apple Jelly is made the same as plain apple jelly.

VANILLA SPONGE WITH CURRANTS.—One tablespoon of gelatine soaked ten minutes in quarter of a cup of cold water and dissolved in quarter of a cup of boiling water; add three quarters of a cup of sugar and one teaspoon of vanilla and stir until mixture is blended and thickened, and then add the beaten whites of two eggs and continue beating until quite firm. Mould in cups and serve on a platter with ripe currants.

CURRANT JELLY.—Carefully pick leaves and large stems from ripe or nearly ripe currants, put in preserving kettle, crush slightly and heat slowly; stirring frequently. When thoroughly hot crush with wooden vegetable masher and strain through double square of cheese-cloth, by letting it drain, but do not use pressure. Later the cloth may be put over another bowl and squeezed and this second juice used for jelly of second quality. The clear juice may be made into jelly at once or strained again if desired. Measure the juice and for every pint of juice allow a pint of granulated sugar. Stir until the sugar is dissolved, place over fire and watch till it boils up; then draw it back and skim; do this three times, then pour into glasses that have been taken from hot water and placed on a hot cloth in a sunny window, but where there is no draught. As soon as jelly is set, cover with a thick coating of paraffin, or, better still, have ready disks of thick white paper, size of glasses. When the jelly is set, brush the top lightly with brandy or alcohol, dip the paper in the spirits and put over top of jelly. Then put on covers, but if you have none, cover with disks of paper about an inch larger than the top of the glass and wet with beaten white of an egg, mixed with a tablespoon of cold water, pressing the paper down well to make them stick to the glass. If paraffin alone is used, the coating should be a quarter of an inch thick.

Raspberry and blackberry jelly are made the same as currant jelly.

STRAWBERRY PRESERVES.—Hull berries, pick over carefully, wash and drain; then weigh. Fill glass jars with berries. Make a syrup by boiling three-quarters weight of berries in sugar with water, allowing one cup of water to each pound of sugar. Fill jars to overflowing with this syrup and let stand half an hour, then add more fruit to fill jars. Screw covers on and place jars on trivet in kettle of cold water, heat to boiling point and keep just a trifle under that for one hour.

Raspberries may be preserved in the same way.

SPICED CURRANTS.—To eight pounds carefully picked and washed currants add five and one half pounds brown sugar, one pint of vinegar, and spice made by tying three tablespoons cinnamon and one tablespoon of cloves in a bag. Bring to a boil and cook slowly an hour and a half, stirring often enough to prevent burning. Turn into jelly glasses and cover with paraffin.

GOOSEBERRY CATCHUP.—Remove bloom and stem ends from eight pounds of gooseberries, put into preserving kettle and mash thoroughly, using a wooden potato masher for the purpose. Add a small amount of water and let come to the boiling point and rub through a medium coarse sieve. To this add three and one half pounds brown sugar, one pint of vinegar, and let cook slowly for nearly two hours, then add a spice bag made by putting three ounces of stick cinnamon and two ounces of cloves in a muslin bag, and let simmer an hour longer.—N. E. LEIGHTON, Manchester, N. H.

PRESERVED GOOSEBERRIES.—Cut the stem and bloom ends from berries and wash and weigh and allow equal weight of sugar. Put berries in kettle with just enough water to cover and after the berries have boiled about fifteen minutes add the sugar. Boil slowly, stirring frequently, until the mixture thickens. Let cool a little and put into sterilized jars.

CURRANT BLANC-MANGE.—One half box of gelatine, one quart of sweet milk, one half cup of sugar, flavor to taste. Mix milk and sugar together and let it boil, strain through a sieve, add the gelatine and vanilla, place into a mould, serve with a ring of currants and top with same.—MARY HARROD NORTHEND, Salem, Mass.

SPICED GOOSEBERRIES.—Prepare six pounds of gooseberries and add four and one half pounds of sugar, one pint of vinegar and one tablespoon each cloves and cinnamon. Cook slowly for two hours and turn into jelly glasses and seal with paraffin.

CANNED RHUBARB.—Select choice stalks of rhubarb and wash and wipe carefully, being careful not to remove the skin. Cut the stalks to fit the jar, or into inch-long pieces, and pack into sterilized jars. Let cold water run into jars to overflow, adjust rubbers and covers and set in a cool place.

Foods to enjoy in summer

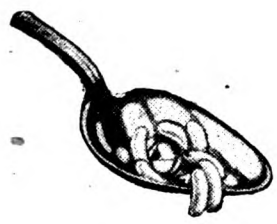
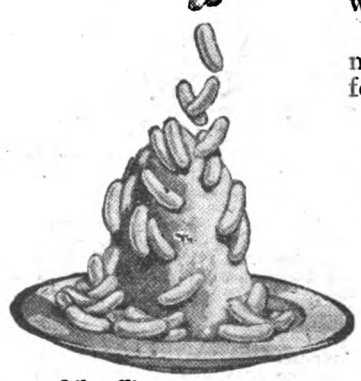
With strawberries mix Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs. They add as much as the cream and sugar. The grains are flimsy, crisp and flaky, and they belong to berries as crust belongs to shortcake.



In every milk dish float Puffed Wheat. These are whole-grain bubbles, crisp and toasted, puffed to eight times normal size.



The grains are enticing. Never was a wheat food half so inviting. And they make whole wheat wholly digestible, for every food cell is exploded.

For breakfast serve with cream and sugar—the Puffed Grain you like best.

Wheat bubbles
In the bowl of milk

Like flimsy nut meats
On ice cream

For dinner scatter Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs on the ice cream. Use as wafers in your soups.

At playtime crisp and douse with melted butter. The children then have food confections.

All day long

Puffed Grains taste like tidbits. Children revel in them. To millions every day they bring an added joy.

Yet they are grain foods—two are whole grains. They are the best-cooked cereals in existence.

You can offer children nothing that is better. In summer have them handy all day long.

Puffed Wheat Puffed Rice Corn Puffs

Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour

Puffed Grains are Prof. Anderson's inventions. All are steam exploded, all shot from guns. Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is easy and complete. All are bubble-like and toasted. They are scientific foods.

Puffed rice pancake flour

We now mix ground Puffed Rice in a self-raising pancake flour. The exploded food cells make the pancakes fluffy. And they taste as though made with nut flour. Never were pancakes so delicious. Try them.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A FATAL TELEGRAM.

SEVERAL days previous to Violet's recapture Wallace and Lord Cameron were enjoying their after-dinner smoke in the room of the former.

They had been in the habit of dining together at a certain club-house, the privileges of which had been tendered him as a compliment during his present visit, after which they always repaired to Wallace's room for a quiet, social chat and smoke before his lordship betook himself up-town to make his daily call upon his fiancee.

Upon this occasion, instead of chatting, both young men were engaged in reading the newspaper, when Wallace suddenly looked up at his companion, remarking, with considerable excitement:

"Here is the queerest advertisement, Cameron! Listen," and he read the following:

WANTED.—Information regarding a Miss Mary Lawrence, formerly of Boston, Mass. Report immediately at No. ——— Wall Street.

"Well, what is there so strange about that?" asked Lord Cameron. "It seems like an ordinary personal to me—unless, indeed, you know the lady."

"She was my mother; at least, my mother, previous to her marriage, was a Miss Mary Lawrence, and she lived in Boston."

"Indeed! Then of course the advertisement is startling to you," returned his companion.

At about eleven o'clock the next morning, Wallace entered the elegant office of the wealthy banker, and asked to see the gentleman who had caused the above personal to be inserted in the newspaper.

The gentlemanly clerk conducted him to a private office, and introduced him to "Mr. Horace A. Lawrence."

Wallace made known his errand, while Mr. Lawrence regarded him with the closest scrutiny, and when the young man concluded, he asked, briefly:

"Can you give me any information concerning the person mentioned?"

"I am not sure, sir, whether I can or not," Wallace answered, smiling. "I can, however, give you the history of a Miss Mary Lawrence, whose home was formerly in Boston, Massachusetts, but she may not be the woman whom you wish to find."

"Where was she born?" Mr. Lawrence inquired.

"In Salem, Massachusetts."

"What were her parents' names?"

"William and Hannah."

"Now the year of her birth, if you please."

"January 3d, 1830."

"Correct; she is the lady of whom I am in search. She is my cousin, and used to be a very dear one," said Mr. Lawrence, his face lighting with pleasure. "Where is she living at the present time?"

"She is not living," said Wallace, sadly. "She died a year ago, last September."

"Dead! Is Mary dead?" exclaimed his companion, with visible emotion. "Ah, we were such good friends—she was such a jolly, good-natured companion—such a reliable confidante. I loved Mary Lawrence as if she had been my own sister. But tell me what relationship do you sustain toward her, young man?"

"I am her son."

Mr. Lawrence reached out and grasped Wallace warmly by the hand.

He did not doubt the truth of his statement in the least; indeed, he had more than half-suspected it from the first, from his resemblance to his mother, and he was very much prepossessed by his appearance.

"I am heartily glad of the meeting, and I believe you are a worthy son of such a mother," he said. "It is thirty years since I saw her, and she was then living in Boston. She was a girl of seventeen, and I a youth of nineteen, and we had been fond of each other from our childhood. My family moved to the West about that time, where we resided for many years. After my parents' death, I practiced law in San Francisco for a couple of years, then went abroad, and was absent five more. After my return from Europe, I established myself in the city, and then tried to learn something of my Uncle William's family. I was informed that both he and his wife were dead, but no one could tell me anything of their daughter. I supposed she had married and moved from Boston, and I was deeply disappointed in not being able to find her, for I yearned to renew the old-time friendship. Years went by, and I lost my wife, who left me one little daughter, who was sadly afflicted with blindness, and the past twelve years I have devoted wholly to her and my business. "But," he concluded, with deep emotion, "I was not to have even one ewe lamb spared to me, and I buried my little girl only a few weeks ago."

"That was very sad, Mr. Lawrence," Wallace said, in a tone of sincere sympathy; "none escape—death comes to all of us."

"Ah, yes; and it must have been very hard for you to lose your mother. Is your father living?" inquired his companion.

"No, sir; he died more than ten years ago."

"Richardson, I believe you told me is your name? What was his business?"

"Builder and contractor."

"Did he leave your mother well provided for?"—excuse me if I seem curious, but my interest in my cousin leads me to wish to know all about her."

"No, sir; my father left only enough to meet his liabilities," Wallace answered, flushing slightly, "and my mother had a hard time for several years."

"Do you follow your father's business?" Mr. Lawrence asked, studying the noble face before him intently.

"I learned the carpenter's trade, but I am now an architect in this city."

"Indeed! Where were you educated in your profession?"

"In Cincinnati."

"In Cincinnati?" repeated Mr. Lawrence, with a sudden inward thrill, as it just then occurred to him that Violet's home had been in that city and that she had loved a young man named Richardson, who was an architect.

Could it be possible that the son of his cousin was her lover? Ah! no, for she had told him that her betrothed had died while she was abroad.

"Where did your mother die, Mr. Richardson?" he asked.

"In Cincinnati, sir."

Again the man was startled by what seemed a strange coincidence, for Violet had said that her lover had betrayed his affection for her as they stood together by his dead mother's casket. Still he did not like to bring Violet's name into the conversation just then.

"Have you a family?" he asked after a moment.

"No, sir; I—have been married, but—I have lost my wife," Wallace responded, in a husky tone.

"I am very sorry; this is hard for you at your age," Mr. Lawrence said, with heartfelt sympathy, and sure now that Violet's lover must have been some other architect. "Tell me more about yourself and your mother—that is, if it will not be too painful to do so."

Wallace gave him a brief account of his whole life, reserving only that portion relating to Violet; the subject of his marriage and his cruel loss was too sacred to be spoken of to a stranger, and he never referred to it to any one, excepting Lord Cameron; indeed, he could never mention his young wife's name with any degree of self-control.

"You have had something of a struggle during your short life, haven't you, my young cousin?" Mr. Lawrence remarked, with earnest feeling when Wallace concluded.

"Yes, sir, it has been rather hard up-hill work some of the time, but I believe I am all the better prepared for life for having had difficulties to conquer."

"There can be no doubt of it," Mr. Lawrence replied, heartily, while he added to himself: "He's a fine fellow—a fellow to be proud of, and I will cultivate his acquaintance."

Then he continued, aloud:

"But I trust you have reached smoother sailing by this time."

"Yes, sir; my prospects appear to be quite encouraging just at present," Wallace modestly replied; then he named the gentleman with whom he had formed a partnership.

The more Mr. Lawrence conversed with him the better he was pleased, and when their conversation was finally interrupted, he insisted that Wallace should come to dine with him that evening.

The young man accepted his invitation with thanks and then went his way to his own business.

He repaired to Mr. Lawrence's elegant residence at the appointed hour and spent a most delightful evening with his newly discovered relative.

Mr. Lawrence was so full of old-time memories that his conversation was chiefly confined to his own early life and his pleasant relations with Wallace's mother, and thus nothing was said by either to arouse a suspicion that the other knew anything of Violet Huntington's history.

"You will be very friendly, will you not, Wallace?" Mr. Lawrence said, when he parted from him at a late hour. "I am a lonely old man, and young companionship, like yours, will be very acceptable to me; so give me all of your society that you can conveniently, and feel perfectly free to make this your home whenever you like."

Wallace thanked him and went away feeling a bit the less lonely and forlorn because of his newly discovered link with the past.

Mr. Lawrence went directly to his library after the young man's departure, unlocked his safe, and drew forth a legal-looking document.

This was his will.

He made some slight alterations in it, inserted Wallace Richardson's name, as co-equal heir with Violet, and then added a codicil, stating that if the young girl should not be found within five years the whole of his property should revert to his young cousin.

"Shall I ever see the dear girl again?" he murmured, a spasm of pain contracting his brow. "I pray that I may learn something definite regarding her fate soon, for this suspense is intolerable."

A few evenings later a couple of his intimate friends called upon him, and Mr. Lawrence requested them to witness his will. This they did, and afterward their conversation turned upon the mysterious disappearance of Violet.

It was the remark of these two gentlemen, regarding the same subject, that Wilhelm Mencke overheard as he dogged their footsteps, when they left the residence of the banker on the evening of Violet's escape from her captor's power.

The next day Mr. Lawrence was called out of town upon business that would detain him for several days.

* * * * * *

Violet felt greatly elated over her success in sending her letter to her friend, and was sure that he would effect her release some time during the next day.

She had difficulty in preserving her self-control in the presence of Sarah, for she knew that the woman was very keen, and would suspect her secret unless it was carefully guarded.

She retired early, hoping to sleep the time away; but she was nervous and anxious, and a hundred doubts and fears about her letter reaching its destination, beset her, and counteracted the influences of the drowsy god.

But she slept, at last, and when morning dawned hope reasserted itself, and she felt assured that today she would be free.

Oh! how long the hours seemed till noon, and yet no one came.

"He will surely come this afternoon," she said, trying to fortify herself with the hope; but the day waned, and no sign of any friendly aid was visible; and, as darkness came on again, her heart sank, while she started at every step and every sound so nervously that Sarah at last remarked it.

"What ails you, Miss Violet? What are you afraid of that you keep starting so?"

Violet flushed crimson, and then grew suddenly pale.

It would never do, she thought, to betray herself like this, or her captors would immediately remove her to some other place, and then Mr. Lawrence would never find her.

"I do not want to see Wilhelm Mencke again—don't let him come into the room, will you, Sarah?" she said, hoping to ward off suspicion thus.

"What are you afraid of, child? He cannot harm you. I would not allow him to harm you," the woman replied, reassuringly.

"But he makes me very nervous. I believe I—loathe him," said Violet.

"Her nerves are getting unstrung—she will get sick if she is kept cooped up like this much longer," Sarah muttered to herself, while her sympathies went out more and more toward the unfortunate girl.

Violet's nerves were becoming unstrung, and she was so terribly disappointed that her letter had not brought the speedy relief she expected, that she sobbed herself to sleep that night.

The next morning she was weak and unrefreshed, and did not rise until late.

Then she had no appetite for her breakfast, and sat all day by the window looking out upon the street, watching eagerly every passer-by, and listening intently to every footfall upon the pavement and stairs.

No one came, and how interminable the hours seemed!

Night shone down upon her again, and all through its silent and lonely watches the young girl tossed feverishly and restlessly.

The third morning she was wan and hollow-eyed, and though she arose and dressed herself, she could not sit up, and went back upon the bed, where she lay white and still, eating nothing, and taking no notice of anything.

Late in the afternoon Wilhelm Mencke came to see how his captive was faring.

He was in excellent spirits, for he had that morning received a telegram from his wife, who said that everything was working favorably for her, and she hoped to be back in New York at the expiration of a week.

Sarah expressed a fear that Violet was going to be ill, and this report disturbed him somewhat, for it would materially disarrange his plans to have to nurse her through a long sickness just now.

He tried to arouse her, but she either could not or would not speak to him, and he at length went away, feeling very anxious as well as irritated.

Meantime Mrs. Mencke was meeting with the most flattering success in her schemes.

Upon her arrival in Cincinnati she had been received with great cordiality by her former friends, who, of course, had all heard of the recent fortune which had apparently fallen to her as nearest of kin to her ill-fated sister.

The lawyer who had it in charge greeted her most politely, expressing his gratification at her return, and over the fact that he would now be able to get rid of the property, which he had feared would be likely to prove an annoying incumbrance to him.

No one thought of questioning the fact of Violet's death, for both Mrs. Hawley and Nellie Bailey had been abroad at the time of the sad tragedy at Mentone, and had testified to the sad bereavement; and thus it seemed as if all business would be speedily transacted, Mrs. Mencke recognized as the legitimate heir, and the fortune of Jonas Huntington surrendered to her without a question.

She explained her recent absence in an off-hand manner, saying that she and her husband had preferred to reside in New York since their return from abroad, and that they probably would never make their home again in Cincinnati, as Mr. Mencke believed he could be more prosperous elsewhere.

Mrs. Hawley, her old friend, insisted that she should make her house her home during her stay in the city, and she showed her every possible attention, going with her often when she visited her former friends, and therefore Mrs. Mencke seemed like her old proud, imperious self once more.

All this was very pleasant, and the woman was very much elated, enjoying her return to social life to the utmost.

She had been absent just a week from New York when Mr. Middleton, the lawyer, informed her that he would "make a final settlement on the morrow," when all papers, bonds, money, etc., would be surrendered to her.

It seemed now as if her triumph was complete, and she was the life of a grand farewell reception given in her honor that night by Mrs. Hawley. Many people spoke of it afterward, and remarked that they had never seen Mrs. Mencke so handsome or so gay during all her previous residence in Cincinnati.

She received the congratulations of her friends upon her recent good fortune with a feeling akin to exultation in her heart, but with outward composure. Many expressed regret that she would not remain in her old home, and that they could not have the pleasure of congratulating her husband also. She thanked them in his name, but remarked that pressing business had detained him in New York.

She retired that night full of hope, and feeling that a bright future was opening out before her, while she gave not one regretful thought to the fair young captive whom she had left to the tender mercies of her coarse husband and his hireling.

The next morning she repaired to Mr. Middleton's office for the final settlement he had promised.

Her trunk was packed, her tickets purchased, and everything arranged for her return to New York on the afternoon express.

Mr. Middleton was awaiting her, but, somehow, she imagined that there was a certain constraint in his manner as he greeted her, which had not been apparent before.

"Well," she said, gayly, "I suppose my waiting is ended, and my hopes are to be realized at last."

"Ahem!" returned Mr. Middleton, with some embarrassment, "I expected that I should be able to settle everything this morning, but——"

"But what?" demanded his client, with some show of impatience, a frown of annoyance and displeasure settling upon her brow. "Haven't I clearly proved my identity, and my claim to this property?" she concluded, somewhat sarcastically.

"Your identity, Mrs. Mencke, is certainly not to be disputed, but—but I am obliged to tell you that your claim to Jonas Huntington's property is," returned the lawyer, gravely.

"Good gracious! What do you mean?" demanded Mrs. Mencke, sharply, and losing all her brilliant color, while a nervous trembling seized her.

For reply, Mr. Middleton took a slip of yellow paper from his table and held it out to her.

It was a telegram, received that very morning—even within that hour.

The woman seized it with a hand that shook like a leaf, and read:

"NEW YORK CITY, March 1st, 188—.

"TO RALPH MIDDLETON, ESQ.:

"Stay all proceedings connected with the Huntington fortune. Violet Huntington is still living.

"WALLACE RICHARDSON."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE GAME IS PLAYED OUT.

A terrible shock thrilled through Mrs. Mencke's nerves as she read this significant message.

"Heavens!" she cried, with a face as white as her handkerchief, "what can it mean?"

"It means, madame, that there has either been some terrible mistake, or—there has been a great wrong attempted," the lawyer observed, sternly, as he searched the woman's colorless countenance with his keen eyes.

The message told his wretched companion a great deal. It told her that Violet had been discovered—that Wallace had found his wife, that all Wilhelm's plotting and crime had been revealed, while doubtless, he had been arrested, and she might also be arraigned for complicity in the wretched business immediately upon her return.

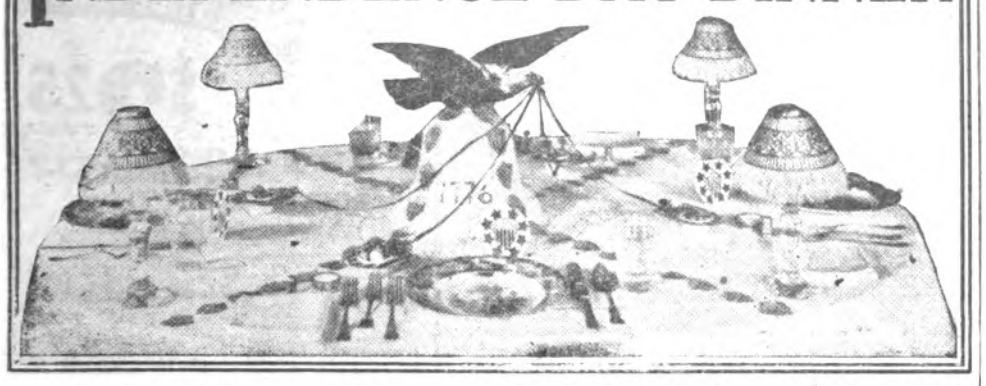
"The message, as you perceive, was sent from New York," Mr. Middleton continued, as she did not reply, but sat staring helplessly at the words of the telegram, "so doubtless your sister is in that city at the present time. You came from New York City here, Mrs. Mencke—did you know that she was living when you presented your claim for Jonas Huntington's fortune?"

Mr. Middleton's tone was very grave as he put this pertinent question.

Mrs. Mencke's thoughts had worked very rapidly in spite of the stunning announcement that she had just read, and she realized that everything depended now upon a cool, clear head, and assuming a bold and fearless front. She bridled instantly at the lawyer's inquiry, and turned upon him an astonished and injured look.

"What a question!" she exclaimed, indignantly, "and what a perfectly absurd statement this is," she continued, running her eye again over the telegram which she still held, "for there are scores of people who would take their oath that they saw Violet Huntington buried at Mentone. Lord Cameron, the gentleman to whom she was engaged, identified the body; he is now in New York, and would swear to the fact if need be. My husband also saw it, and there are many others whom I could name, Mr. and Mrs. Hawley, and Nellie Bailey have all been to her grave, and now you ask me if I knew that she was living," and she concluded with a laugh of bitter derision.

"Then you do not believe that the person referred to in that telegram is your sister?" said Mr. Middleton, still regarding her face searchingly.



"I will swear that she is not my sister," positively asserted Mrs. Mencke, who was very glad that his question had been put in this form. "This is some miserable plot."

Mr. Middleton looked perplexed. Mrs. Mencke's statements seemed to have the ring of truth and reason in them.

"Who is this Wallace Richardson who sent the message?" he asked.

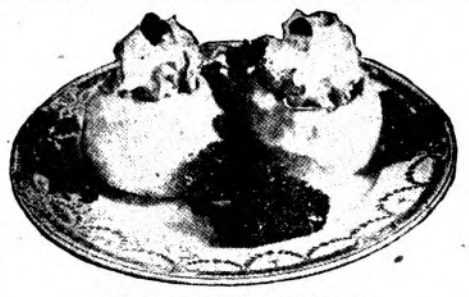
INDEPENDENCE DAY DINNER

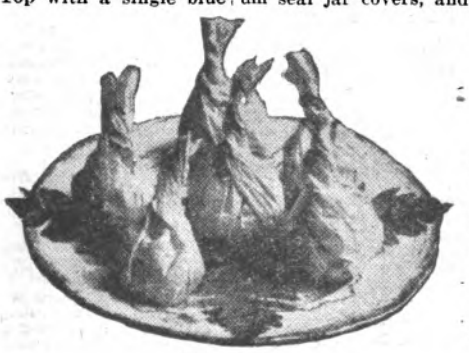


By Violet Marsh

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett Pub., Inc.

I was born an American, I live an American, I shall die an American.—Daniel Webster.

OVERFLOWINGLY patriotic is the arrangement of this Fourth-of-July table. As illustrated, a Liberty bell was fashioned from light wire, covered with white crepe paper and used as a centerpiece. On each side of the bell, in red paper figures, is the year of our independence, 1776. Starting from the center top are four lines of shields extending to the edge of table. These are made from red, white and blue paper. (Some stores sell these shields by the box.) Perched on top of the white bell is an eagle, made from cardboard and covered with gold and silver colored paper. From the eagle's beak hang red, white and blue ribbons which lead to red-paper bonbon boxes. In one corner of each box stands a tiny American flag to serve as a souvenir for each guest. At each plate stands a shield outlined with silver stars.



BEETS AND MASHED POTATO.

The refreshments can to some extent be made patriotic. The beets filled with potatoes are decorative, and the torpedoes, while they won't "go off," are delicious and the paper wrappings can be made to look quite real. A beautiful centerpiece can be made by cutting a watermelon in half, scraping out the center so that a band one inch deep of the red will be left, and filling the shell with bluebells which are in bloom at that season. Cut out the melon in slices just right to serve so there may be no waste. Cakes iced in colors and mingled together while supporting tiny flags may be used.

TORPEDOES.—Shell roasted peanuts and remove the brown skin. Take an equal amount of sugar and slowly melt it without the addition of water. The sugar should be stirred frequently while melting, and then put where it is a little hotter and constantly stirred until it is a light brown color. Pour it over the nuts which have been spread in a lightly buttered pan. Break into small pieces when cold and wrap in two thicknesses of paper to resemble torpedoes. It is well to have the inside paper paraffined. If the candy is made the day before using it should be kept in a tightly covered pail or can.

PATRIOTIC BEETS.—Boil medium-sized beets, peel, scoop out the centers and fill with mashed potato. The potato should be mashed with hot milk and beaten white. Top with a single blue flower just before serving.

FOURTH-OF-JULY HORNS.—Soften one cup of chicken fat or other shortening and gradually beat in one cup of molasses and one cup of sugar. Beat until light and creamy. Add one even tablespoon of ginger, one half tablespoon of cinnamon, one saltspoon of clove and one even teaspoon of salt. Dissolve one teaspoon of soda in one half cup of cold water, add to mixture and then stir in enough flour to make quite a stiff dough. Roll very thin and with a sharp pointed knife cut into horn shapes, and bake. These cookies are delicious and keep a long time if tightly covered.

Value Your Time in Dollars and Cents —Start the Canning

I wonder how many women realize that right in their own homes they are a part of the great labor body, and that whenever the prices of labor rise their own time is worth just that much more. Whether it be in ready-to-eat food, or in ready-to-wear clothing, the difference between the cost of the materials and the price of the finished product represents the value of your labor that has gone into the making and it will be found that labor is the highest priced commodity that we buy.

Every housewife, in justice to herself, should know how much she is adding to the family purse when she fills her shelves with jars of food for winter use; when she does all the family cooking, sewing, mending, washing, ironing and cleaning, for such information would prove that her earning capacity was by no means small, and that she fully deserved the title of "better half."

Another reason why we must avail ourselves of every opportunity to conserve food for next winter is that the high cost of labor threatens a crop shortage. Fill all the jars, glasses and bottles.

FOURTH-OF-JULY HORNS.

Cold Pack Canning Succeeds by Starting Right

The progress made in successful canning during the past two summers has been little short of marvelous. While we canned to help win the war, whether or not we had past experience, we can go ahead now with an assurance that counts as our reward for faithful perseverance.

To those who have not been wholly successful, I will venture to say that sufficient importance has not been placed on sterilization. Unless a jar has been made absolutely clean (and the time to do this is when it is emptied), and sterilized in boiling water, the contents will spoil. Another cause may be that cooking did not continue long enough to penetrate the center of jars.

The following directions for canning will lead to success if closely followed, and will apply to further canning articles which will appear in our August, September and October issues. These will include canning of vegetables, fruit and meat; jelly, jam and fruit butter making, and pickling.

That there may be no confusion as to the meaning of cold pack canning, I will explain that it is the simple process of packing the product uncooked, and cooking it in the jars which are partly sealed. Any kind of food can be successfully canned by this process. By the cold pack method waste is unnecessary, for if just enough food is available to fill a pint jar it can be packed, set into a kettle on something that will keep it from the bottom and cooked while the fire is being used for other purposes. Many people who do not have an abundance of raw food at any one time do all their canning in this way. A lard pail that covers tightly and is high enough to admit a quart jar makes an excellent single jar outfit.

For more extensive work, a boiler with a wooden rack in the bottom that any woman can make is all that is necessary. Or a tray with four shallow sides and slat bottom is excellent. A large-size screweye is screwed into the wood near each corner, and through each is looped a piece of large wire which extends nearly to the top of the boiler and acts as a handle by which the entire tray of jars may be lifted from the boiling water at one time. Jar holders can be bought that hold each jar separately and away from the bottom of boiler.

Factory-made outfits include the hot water bath, steam canner and pressure cooker. In steam outfits the jars set in a crate above a small amount of water which gives forth a big head of steam. The pressure cooker requires less time for cooking so that a small sized one will do as much canning in a given time as a larger hot bath outfit that cooks slower.

The advantage of cooking in the closed jar is that it prevents any bacteria from getting in. When the product is cooked in the open kettle, then transferred to the jar, there is always the possibility that the jar itself, the cup, tunnel, spoon or holder has not been thoroughly sterilized. Also the texture and flavor are better if cooked in the closed jar.

Before using jars, fill with cold water, adjust rubbers and tops and test for leakage. Avoid jars and tops that have rough places around the edges as they will not properly "seat" into the rubber and leakage will result. Examine all vacuum seal jar covers, and if the gum at any point is rough or has been broken off, the jar will not properly seal.

Vegetable Canning in Hot Water Bath

Select vegetables that are sound and in prime condition to eat. Wash thoroughly in cold water. Many vegetables are improved by blanching, which means they are immersed in boiling water a given time and immediately plunged into cold water.

SNAP BEANS.—Wash, snap each end and string at the same time. Break into even lengths. Put into white cotton cloth bag or large strainer and hold in boiling water five minutes, remove and quickly dip into a pail of cold water. Fill cans closely, add one teaspoon of salt to each quart can and fill to overflowing with boiling water. Adjust rubber and top. If a screw top is used, turn the cover well on and then back about one half inch. This allows the steam to escape. If the patent wire top is used, place the rubber and glass top, bring the wire in place but leave the clamp up. Vacuum seal tops are held in boiling water a few seconds, placed on jars and held by clamp. Set into boiler, fill with water to shoulder of jars. If the water is quite warm it will not break the jars and hastens boiling. When the water is actually boiling (rolling), cook three hours from that time. Remove, finish sealing and set to cool away from drafts. Do not remove clamps from vacuum sealed jars until the following day. An allowance should be made for longer cooking if the beans are a little hard. This process applies to lima beans, other shelled beans, hominy, peas and vegetable combinations.

Greens, including dandelion, Swiss chard, kale, turnip tops, beet tops, spinach, asparagus, mustard greens, etc., are blanched fifteen minutes and plunged into cold water. Fill jars the same as for beans and cook two hours.

MY CANNED CORN.—Husk and silk the ears of corn. Hold on end in the center of a large plate and with a downward stroke cut off the corn not too close to the hull. Go all around the cob the second time with a downward stroke and it will press out the milk from the portion of the kernel remaining on the cob. Fill jars about two thirds full, add two level teaspoons of sugar to each quart jar, fill with boiling water, adjust tops as described and cook three hours. The corn will swell and fill jars, and when opened should be as tender as fresh corn. Use only corn that is in milk. It is far better to can corn that is a little under what is usually considered right for the table than when it is too hard. It will not become tender in the cans.

WHOLE CANNED TOMATOES.—Grade for quality, ripeness and size. The perfectly ripened and smaller ones are best to can whole. Scald in boiling water one minute and plunge into cold water. Remove core without cutting beyond the green color with a small, sharp-pointed knife. Peel. Pack closely into jars. There is no need of adding water or syrup. Seal as directed. If the jars are hot when filled they may be put into boiling water in the bath. In this way the finished product is of finer color and flavor. Cook twenty-two minutes after the water begins to boil hard.

CANNED TOMATOES.—Use tomatoes that are irregular in size and shape and have to be trimmed. Blanch and cold dip. Peel and core. Cut into pieces and fill jars. Cook twenty-two minutes.

STRAINED TOMATO.—Prepare as for canned tomatoes, cook in open kettle until the pulp is tender. Put through strainer to remove seeds and pulp that will not go through. Many cut up the tomatoes without peeling when it is to be strained. It is just as well and saves labor. Fill bottles or jars and cook twenty-two minutes. If bottles are used, put the corks in lightly, when cooked, press in hard, cut off even with top of bottle, wipe dry and dip into hot sealing wax or paraffin.

BEETS.—Select small, tender beets. There are varied ideas about canning beets, many claiming they should be cooked in the open kettle before canning. This is true unless the beets are young. For the cold pack process, cut tops off within one inch of the beet, blanch three minutes and plunge into cold water. Scrape off the peel. Fill hot jars with beets, then with boiling water. Put into boiling hot bath and cook three hours.

CARROTS.—Proceed the same as with beets.

Canned Fruits

THIN SYRUP.—Slowly add three pints of sugar to two pints of hot water. Bring slowly to a boil, stirring only until the sugar is dissolved.

MEDIUM SYRUP.—Cook syrup until it begins to be sticky when a little cools in a spoon.

HEAVY SYRUP.—Cook syrup until it will hardly pour.

Use only sound fruit for best results. Wash with great care. Handle as little as possible.

CANNED STRAWBERRIES.—Fill hot jars with fruit. Pour over medium syrup until it fills all the crevices. Seal as directed. Cook twenty minutes.

SUN STRAWBERRY PRESERVES.—Use only ripe firm berries. Preserve the same day they are picked. Wash, hull and drain well. Spread in platters in single layers, and sprinkle with sugar. Pour heavy syrup over them and sun under glass ten hours. Window glass held about two inches above the platters is an excellent arrangement. Pack into jars as described and cook twenty minutes.

CANNED CHERRIES.—Stem, and remove stones if preferred. Fill hot jars with fruit and then with hot medium syrup. Cook sixteen minutes after the water begins to boil hard.

STRAWBERRY OR CHERRY JUICE.—Use only acid-proof utensils. Unless a special fruit press is used, put the fruit in a cheese-cloth bag and heat for twenty-five minutes when the juice should freely run. It is well to frequently turn the bag with a gentle pressure during the heating. Take bag from kettle and drain. It may be necessary to strain the juice through the second bag. Too much fruit should not be handled at one time. Fill jars with juice. Put into hot water bath with water to shoulder of jars. When water begins to form bubbles it has reached the right temperature, and should be kept at this point for 45 minutes. Do not boil. Remove from kettle and seal. If odd bottles are used, place cotton stoppers in each, and at the end of cooking press cork-stoppers over the cotton; do not remove it. Trim even and dip ends of bottles in hot paraffin. Any fruit juice may be canned in this way.

CANNED PEACHES.—Peaches must be handled according to variety. Tough, leathery skins are best removed by plunging the peaches into boiling lye, which is made of one pint of wood ashes to two gallons of water. Put peaches into a wire strainer with a bail, or a colander, so that they may be taken immediately from the lye as soon as the skins slip easily. Plunge into cold water at once, and it is well to rinse them through several cold waters to remove all taste of the lye. Tender-skinned peaches need only to be plunged into boiling water and then into cold water to remove the skins. If very ripe they may be peeled without boiling water. Put into jars whole or in halves. A few pits will improve the flavor of the whole jar. Fill jars with thin or medium syrup, according to sweetness of the fruit. Cook twenty minutes after the water begins to boil hard.

PEACH BUTTER.—Peel and remove pits as for canning. A few of the pit meats cut fine and cooked with the fruit will improve the flavor. Mash fine with pestle or put through a potato masher. To each measure of pulp add a half-measure of sugar. Cook very slowly and stir frequently until the desired thickness is obtained. If the butter is put into thoroughly sterilized hot jars, further cooking is unnecessary. Or, open-mouthed jars, large-mouthed bottles or glasses may be used if put boiling hot and covered with a half-inch of hot paraffin.

SMALL BERRIES.—The quality of the fruit has much to do with the finished product. Berries are bruised and crushed if gathered in deep containers. This causes the juice to start and become discolored before canning. All berries are canned in much the same way. The hot sterilized jars are filled closely with fruit, and sweetened with the thin or medium syrup, according to kind and ripeness. Where there is an abundance of fruit, a very superior product can be made by using the squeezed out juice in place of water for making the syrup. Cook sixteen minutes after the water begins to boil.

SWEET FRUIT PICKLES.—Weigh out four pounds of fruit. Make a pickle of two pounds of brown sugar, one-half cup of whole spice, including cloves, cassia buds, allspice and stick cinnamon, and two cups of strong apple vinegar. Tie spices loosely in a bag and cook the pickle slowly fifteen minutes and skim. Add fruit and simmer ten minutes, or until tender but not soft. Very carefully skim out the fruit and put into jar. Cook pickle seven minutes longer, pour it over the fruit in jar and cover. The next morning drain off the pickle with bag of spice and cook about five minutes and pour hot over the fruit. Repeat for three mornings. No set rule can be given for time of cooking down the pickle as the amount of juice in different fruits will vary, but when finished the pickle should well cover the fruit.

Value of Old Cans

Nowadays, nearly every variety of food is put up in tin cans and, since the householder can get nothing for the latter, they are simply thrown out and the number that accumulates in a large town, in a single year, is astounding. As a means of coping with the nuisance, clean up campaigns are carried on, and boys are sometimes paid a cent a dozen for bringing them to a central point. By this means, hundreds of tons are frequently collected in a few hours. The city authorities then sell them to certain manufacturers who have the means of remaking them into a commercial product. The first step of the process is to subject them to intense heat, thus melting off the solder and causing it to run together, when it can be handled in paying quantities. The dented tin is rolled flat and used by trunk manufacturers and makers of toys. The larger pieces are again made into containers for commodities like paint and polish and dye. The tops and bottoms and the scraps that cannot be flattened are pressed into a homogenous mass by large crushers and then sold to foundrymen who melt them up and make window weights of the molten metal.

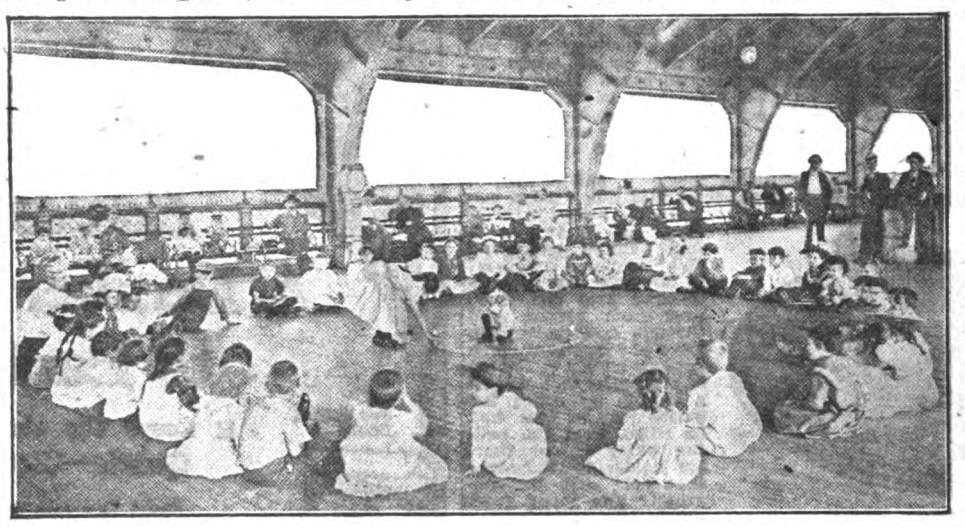
The Impressionable Age of a Child



By Fraces L. Garside

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

MANY states in the Union have truancy laws compelling a child to go to school between the ages of six and fourteen, while they neglect to provide kindergarten classes for the more impressionable period of early childhood when habits of life are being formed. The child who goes to school between four and six will not need the attention of a truancy officer a few years later.

In 1909 the National Kindergarten Association was organized to work for a kindergarten in every public school. This was in New York City, where there are more children per block than in any city in the United States. The society succeeded in doing such effective work that in 1913 the United States Commissioner of Education invited it to co-operate in establishing and maintaining a Kindergarten Division in the United States Bureau of Education in Washington, a proposition that was agreed to, and that has resulted in much legislation favorable to the restless tot, who, if not engaged in instructive games in kindergarten, might be learning destructive games on the street.

The objective point of the organization is better legislation in general, and to incite persons to open kindergartens in their own communities. Several states have what is called the Mandatory-on-Petition Law which provides for the establishment of a kindergarten upon the petition of the parents of twenty-five children of kindergarten age, living in one community.

VACATION KINDERGARTEN, RECREATION PIER, NEW YORK CITY.

This law had its inception in California, and before it had been in force three years the number of kindergartens in the states, as well as the number of pupils attending them, had more than doubled.

Arkansas illustrates in a striking way the demand for free kindergartens. The minimum school age in that state is fixed at six years, so that no state or county money may be used for the education of children of regular kindergarten age. Between the extremes presented by California and Arkansas there are several forms of legislation bearing on the kindergarten. Utah and North Dakota have laws that are partially mandatory. In Nevada, kindergartens are permissive on petition. Of twenty-five states which make any positive attempt to control the situation, one half undeservedly require certification of kindergarten teachers. Only four (Michigan, South Carolina, Texas and Vermont) demand that kindergartners shall have been graduated from training schools officially approved by the state educational authorities.

The last reports show that the kindergarten population of the United States is 4,386,732; with 509,112 children enrolled. Texas reports 190,471 children of kindergarten age, with only 3,536 enrolled, the state ranking forty-second in percentage of children in public and private kindergartens.

The arguments favoring the establishment of kindergartens are these: Every little boy will work for his living some day. Whatever he does, in business or profession, he will depend for success on skill of both mind and hands.

Every little girl will have just as much need for skilled mind and hands, whether in a home or an office.

To give a boy and girl the best start, both hands and minds must be trained from the time they are first used—trained with regard for their powers and for the demands of child nature, not overworked but helped to be usefully active, instead of merely heedlessly active.

The kindergarten gives minds and hands this useful training at the time when they most need it; when they are only making ready for learning the things that take study and close application.

It turns curiosity to observation; restlessness to deftness and interest; "wondering" to understanding.

The kindergarten bridges, from the age of four to six, the sometimes difficult step from home training to school training.

The kindergarten gives a child two years' start.

The democratic kindergarten is the best influence for Americanization that we have today. To begin with, there are the greatest number of children among the foreigners, so many that every child is early deposed from his Throne, the go-cart, and compelled to toddle on wobbly legs beside the younger monarch who has supplanted him. With so many babies around her feet, the alien mother welcomes a kindergarten.

The child learns English, and with our language, our customs and ideals; absorbs American ways for doing everything that had been done before in a Syrian, Hungarian or Italian way. His mother goes to the kindergarten where she meets other mothers; thus she is given the social opportunities which she needs in Americanization and she and her household are benefited. The kindergarten teacher is a welcome visitor in the house of the alien and soon gains the confidence of the shy, bewildered, foreign women. She invites them to the Mothers' Meetings where they mingle socially, and thus national and racial prejudices are overcome.

The National Kindergarten Association has been instrumental in opening more than 300 kindergartens in the public schools of 149 cities. Estimating the cost of operating a class at $1,000 per year, this means more than $300,000 is spent annually on little children.

But with all the work that has been done, much remains to be done. Throughout the country only eleven per cent of the children are in kindergarten, making 89 per cent still unprovided for. In other words, 500,000 children are receiving this training of which nearly 4,000,000 are deprived. Numerically, Belgium is a small country, but before the war that country led the world in kindergarten extension.

Superintendents of schools are unanimously in favor of the kindergarten start for a child. If, they say, a child could have but eight years of school life, it would be better to begin with the kindergarten and close with the seventh grade, than to begin with the first grade and close with the eighth.

Mrs. Mencke's lips curled, and a vicious light leaped into her eyes.

"He is, or was, a beggarly carpenter who used to live here in Cincinnati, and pretended to be enamoured of Violet; he even went so far as to demand her hand in marriage. His suit was of course rejected, and now, possibly, having heard of this fortune being left her, he is taking this way to be revenged upon us."

This also sounded plausible; still, the astute lawyer was not convinced that it was a matter of petty revenge.

"It is very annoying," continued Mrs. Mencke, plaintively, "for I have telegraphed my husband that I shall start for New York this evening—my tickets are purchased, and I must go."

"Ahem! Of course, I am not at liberty to interfere with your arrangements in any way," said Mr. Middleton, thoughtfully, "but under the circumstances I cannot surrender you the documents in my possession, and all proceedings must be stayed, as the message commands, until this matter can be thoroughly investigated."

"By whose authority?" Mrs. Mencke demanded, haughtily.

"My own, madame," he quietly returned.

At this time Mrs. Mencke lost control of herself and flew into a towering passion, declaring that she would have her rights; that she was being shamefully wronged and needlessly detained, when it was absolutely necessary that she should return immediately to New York.

Mr. Middleton listened calmly, until she concluded her tirade, when he again quietly but firmly refused to deliver Jonas Huntington's fortune to her, until he could assure himself that there was no foundation for the report he had received that morning.

Mrs. Mencke argued, pleaded and coaxed, volunteering to bring Mr. and Mrs. Hawley and Miss Bailey to him to confirm the truth of her statements regarding the Mentone tragedy. But it was of no use; he was as immovable as a block of stone.

"While I would not presume to doubt the integrity of the parties named," he gravely said, "still, my duty as the custodian of Mr. Huntington's property and the executor of his will, will not allow me to run any risk of defrauding Miss Violet Huntington, if she should happen to be living, of what rightfully belongs to her."

Mrs. Mencke saw that argument and anger were useless, and she finally flounced out of the lawyer's office in high dudgeon.

She saw that she had gone the length of her rope—that her game was played out at a fearful loss, and she would have to surrender all hope of getting possession of Jonas Huntington's fortune.

It was a terrible disappointment—a terrible humiliation, after her recent triumph in her old home.

She could not remain in Cincinnati to face the results of her failure, and she knew there might be great risk in returning to New York; still, her curiosity to learn what had happened and how Wallace Richardson had discovered Violet, got the better of her fears, and that afternoon's express bore her swiftly back over the ground which, but a week before, she had traversed with so much confidence and hope, and, upon her arrival at her dreary rooms in ——— Street, she found her worst fears realized.

* * * * * * *

It will be remembered that Mr. Lawrence was called out of town upon business the day after he had signed his will in the presence of his two friends.

This was also the day of Violet's recapture by Wilhelm Mencke, also of the departure of Mrs. Mencke for Cincinnati, and so it will be readily understood why no response came to the young girl's letter—why no effort was made to rescue her from her unfortunate situation.

Mr. Lawrence was absent six days, and all this time Violet languished in captivity, losing heart and strength with every weary day.

Her kind friend could not go to her when he did finally return, for, as he was being driven from the station to his home in a public conveyance, the horses became frightened by the passing of a steam fire-engine—one of the traces giving way at that moment, made them more unmanageable, and they dashed at a headlong speed along the street, the carriage was overturned and demolished, and Mr. Lawrence was picked up insensible and seriously injured.

Fortunately he was recognized and taken directly home. A surgeon was summoned, and, upon an examination, it was found that three of the man's ribs and a leg were broken.

His injuries were repaired as far as possible, and he was made comparatively comfortable, but it was not until late the next morning that he was able to think of much besides his own sufferings.

Then he called for his letters, and the first one that he opened was Violet's.

He saw that it had been written a week ago that very day, and a terrible fear and anxiety took possession of him.

In great excitement he sent for his coachman and ordered him to drive at once to the office of Harlow & Richardson, the architects, and bring Mr. Richardson back with him. If the young man was not in, he was to find out his whereabouts and go for him.

"I can trust him in this business, and I do not know to whom else to turn," the sick man murmured, wiping the perspiration from his brow, for he was terribly excited.

An hour later Wallace was sitting by his bedside, while, in spite of his protestations and warnings, the nurse was excluded from the room, for Mr. Lawrence wished to talk freely with his young relative and without the fear of having their conversation repeated.

Wallace, not having been told why he had been so hastily summoned, began to express his sorrow for Mr. Lawrence's sufferings, when he interrupted him abruptly.

"Don't stop to talk about bodily pains," he cried, with an expression of great mental distress, "for I am in far greater anguish of mind. Will you help me?"

"Certainly. I am wholly at your service," Wallace answered heartily, and wondering what sudden trouble had overtaken him.

"I knew you would be. You have heard me speak of the young lady who was governess to my daughter before her death," Mr. Lawrence began.

"Yes."

"Did I tell you that she disappeared very mysteriously a few weeks ago?"

"Yes, you mentioned it, and I saw something about it in one of the papers—her name was given as Miss Huntington."

Wallace's lips paled as he spoke the name, though he did not suspect that it had any connection with his lost love, the queen of his heart.

"Well, I have heard from her; she was kidnapped and carried to a house on ——— Street. Where is the letter—you can read it for yourself," he interposed, looking about the bed for it.

But it had been removed by the nurse, and he would not stop to have it found.

"Never mind," he said, "I will just give the facts, and then you must act quickly. I almost fear that it is too late now to find her. She was locked up in an empty room on ——— Street, but managed to escape from it through the scuttle in the roof about a week ago. She fled along the roof of the houses until she came to one on a corner of the block. Here the very next morning she got into trouble again. I imagine she was recaptured, but she managed some way to send a letter out, begging me to come to her aid. Of course I cannot; but will you go———"

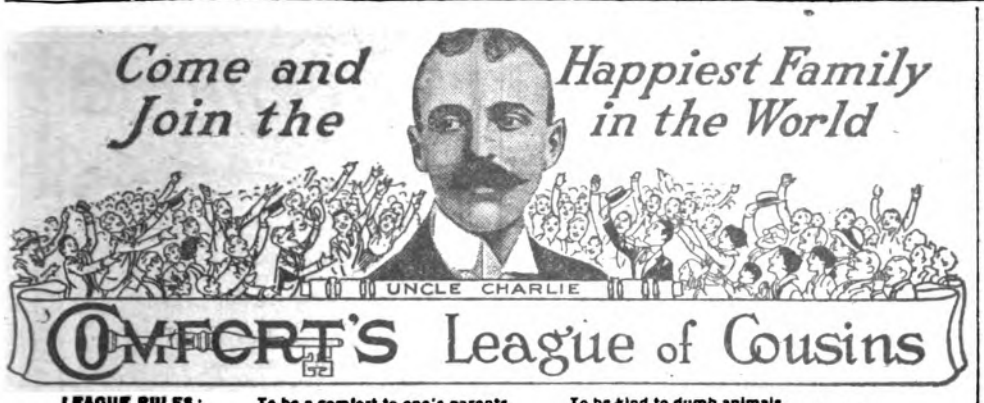
"Yes, yes," Wallace interposed, eagerly. "What is the number of the house?"

"I cannot tell you—she did not know, evidently, but she said it was on a corner, on the south side of the street, there are three flower-pots in the window, which is composed of small panes. Oh, where is that letter?" and the sick man looked anxiously about the room.

"Never mind. If that is all the description she gave you, the letter would not help me any, and I must try to find the place by those blind directions," said Wallace, who was eager to get off upon his search, for all his sympathies were strangely enlisted for this hapless young girl in her great trouble.

"Take an officer—two, if need be," continued Mr. Lawrence, weakly, for he was becoming exhausted. "Do not lose any time, and never mind the expense. She must be found at any cost. Bring her here immediately."

Wallace arose; he had got the main facts of the case, and time was too precious to wait for details. He knew that whatever he did must be promptly done, while he could see that Mr. Lawrence's strength was failing under so much excitement, and he needed rest.



"You will require some money—my wallet———" began the sick man, as he turned to leave the room.

"I have money," Wallace answered briefly, "and we will settle that later; now keep up your courage, and I will do my very best for this young lady."

He went away without another word, called a carriage at the first corner, then sought a policeman to whom he told his story, and together they drove to the street which Violet had named in her letter.

But it was not easy to find the corner which she had tried to describe. There were a great many corner houses on the south side of the street, and most of the windows had small panes of glass, while none of them had just the number of flower-pots behind them that she men-

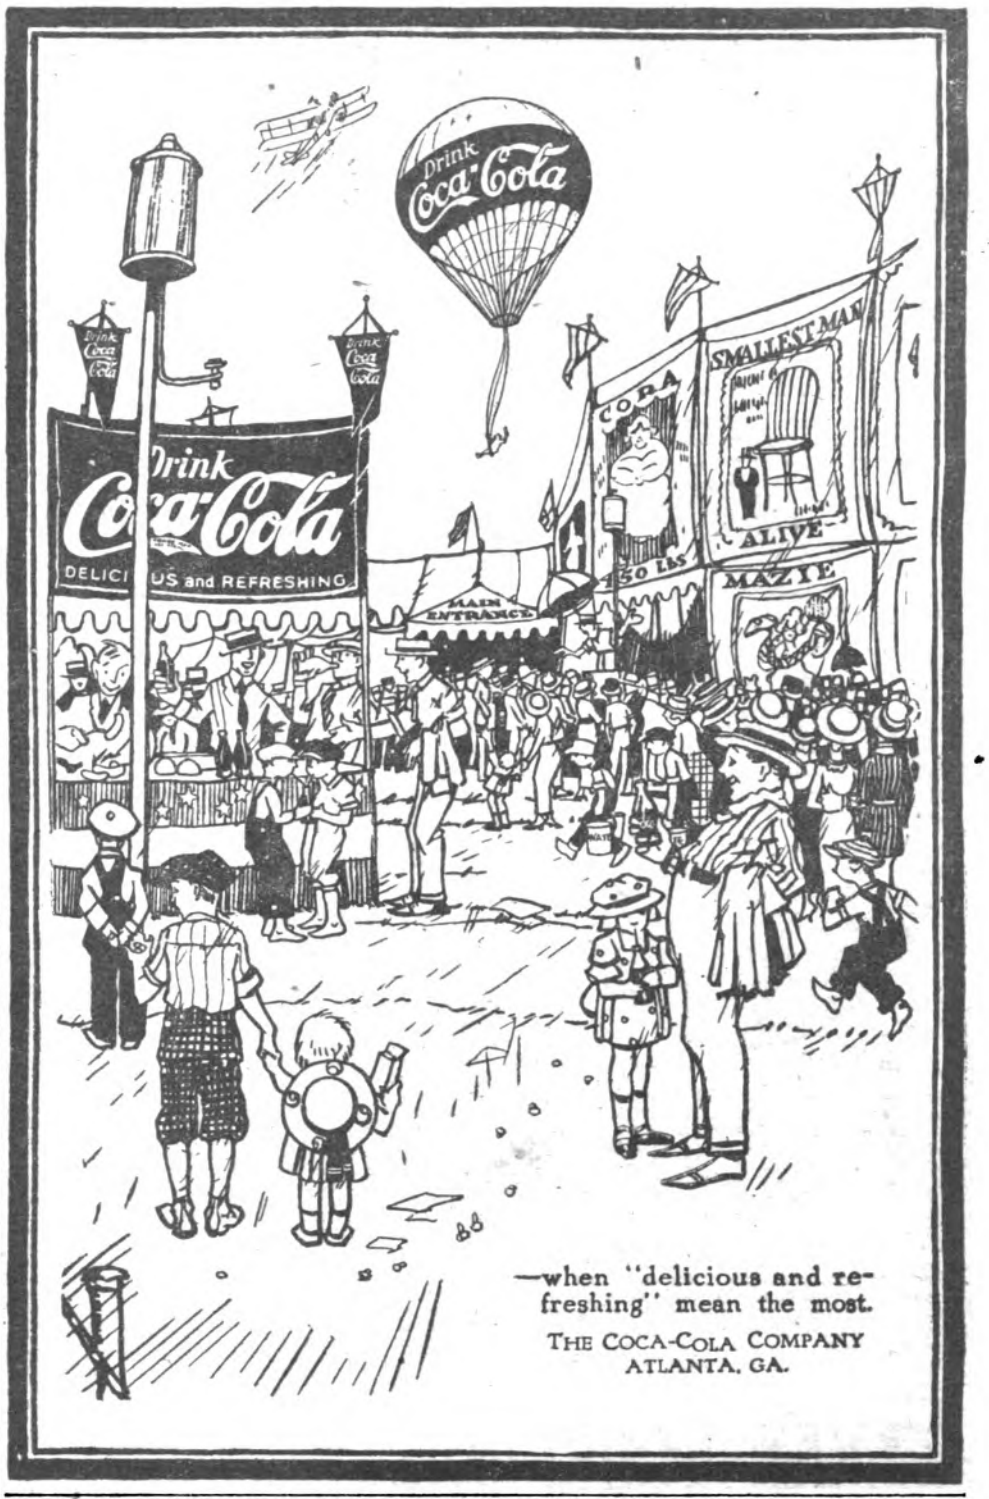
COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 55 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome.
ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

HOP up onto my lap and excuse me if I don't do any flag waving or dig up any of the old stuff about the glorious Fourth. Our flag symbolizes too much that is glorious, beautiful and spiritual for it to be unfurled over a nation that, as one of our greatest preachers only too truthfully remarks, has "lost its soul," and fallen down contemptibly on its job of world reconstruction.

The subject, however, you are most interested in is the high cost of living, which is largely the high cost of loafing, laziness, lunacy and extravagance. I hoped that when the war was over everyone would set to work to upbuild what had been torn down, to replace what had been destroyed; but, alas, about the only thing people are interested in today is to do the other fellow before he can do them, and to get a hundred times as much money for loafing as they previously got for working. Today the world is like a defeated army. It has lost morale and instead of facing its problems heroically, it displays the most ignoble traits of moral and physical degeneracy. For Europe, a very quagmire of blood, disease and starvation, victor and vanquished crushed, broken, shell-shocked and vermin-infested, to have lost morale is not to be wondered at, for, in the language of Holy Writ, "These are they that have come out of great tribulation." They have not only gone through hell but the torments of hell are still upon them. We, however, have been only shell-shocked by extravagance and stupidity, and gassed by hyphenism, laziness, envy, hate and grab. Europe is stewing in the juice of its blood, we in the juice of a complacent self-satisfaction, based on a knowledge of security, wealth and a diamond-studded dinner pail. People have got it into their heads they can live without working. They complain about the high cost of everything and it is their laziness, their unwillingness to produce, to give value for value, that is largely the cause of the troubles of which they complain. Listen to this: "Chicago, May 2.—While May Day brought an increase of $2.00 a day to the building trade in Chicago, building operations have been reduced 50 per cent. These increases in pay (in which twenty crafts participated) have reduced building activities in Chicago one half in the last two months and there is a possibility that the crafts may find themselves with high wage scales but no employment." I am not kicking on the price but the loss of morale. All men are entitled to a wage that permits them to exist in comfort and maintain a reasonable standard of living with enough to educate the kids and something for a rainy day. This labor has a right to have if it labors as it did of yore, but it has no right to use its organized power to force wages up and production down. To demand ten dollars a day for five dollars' worth of work is a hold-up game, pure and simple.

It may interest you to know that with 110,000,000 population, America today is producing enough for only 60,000,000 people and high prices must and will stay up until production is on a level with demand. We have more feet than shoes, more heads than hats, more mouths than food, more bodies than clothing, more stoves and furnaces than coal, more families than houses and more homes than furniture. I have always contended we should develop from within and not from without; that we should breed our own good American stock in American homes, instead of importing foreigners who lower our standards of living and have little sympathy for us and our institutions. But if American labor won't labor, unless we are resigned to death by slow starvation, we've no alternative but to admit those who will work, for though we want to convert our country into a paradise for workers, we will never permit it to become a paradise for shirkers and loafers. It ought not to be a difficult task for our consuls in foreign ports to look over those who want to come here and divide the white sheep of industry from the goats of anarchy. One law-abiding alien worker is worth more to our country than fifty native-born bums overalled or black coated. Half the workers in the basic industries in this country are of foreign birth and there is a shortage in our mills, mines and railroads of four million men. A million foreign-born workers right now are preparing to return to Europe. We need a national immigration policy, a policy of selection, distribution and assimilation. We want no immigrants from countries that specialize in putrid politics, in grabbing all the government jobs, scaring our lawmakers out of their shoes and forcing them to take up their age-long hates, trying to force us into war whether we have a grievance or not. The political immigrant once dug ditches and built houses but now he hands out the plums of office to his tribal followers and makes a fat profit exploiting our city and state governments. We want none of these. We already have too many of that class of Russian Jews who dig no tunnels, bridge no rivers, carry no hods, but as middlemen tack big profits on produce as it goes from producer to consumer, or specialize in stage nudity which they call art, also of the sort that plot the destruction of our country and institutions and shriek hatred of all that is dear to us from the street corners.

All wealth comes from the earth which is the source of all our raw materials. Skilled labor will fashion the raw material into the finished product. As a prominent publicist says: "Without any new immigration of men who are willing to do the rough manual work on roads, railroads and farms, and in subways, mines and forests, it looks as though the physical basis of our American life would crumble. A serious catastrophe threatens our entire social structure. It is becoming top-heavy. Adequate food transportation and raw materials are essential if as a nation we are to be kept prosperous, contented and busy. We should admit to our shores only so many as we have reason from experience to believe we can wholesomely Americanize and steadily employ. Each people should be studied and dealt with separately. Only so many should be admitted from each separate people as our developing experience with immigrants of that people shows us is wise."



There you have it. Industry is tottering for the lack of a base of brawn and muscle. The cities are crowded, the country deserted. Everyone is getting too fine and finicky to dig, delve and produce that which makes life possible and endurable. This is a big problem and it will take more than pinhead partizan politicians to handle it.

In figuring on the high cost of living, you must figure on the new basis of employment in many industries where larger forces are required as a result of the average reduction of the work day from a ten- to an eight-hour period. It had become a settled conviction before the war that a man could produce as much in eight hours as he would in ten. That contention, however, no longer holds good. Production has decreased tremendously, and the lower the product the higher the wage. It takes two men to do what one formerly did. Organized labor is bitterly opposed to immigration, and in the past it had plenty of reason to be, for the big industries used these immigrants to lower the living standards of the American workers. But those trouble makers who defy the authority of their recognized leaders and permit a bunch of red rascals to lead them by the nose, tie up our railroads, freeze us, starve us, bleed us, are not entitled to any special consideration at the hands of the American public. When they use their organized power against the orders of their leaders to upset the machinery of society, they become outlaws. When they deprive us of food, leave hundreds of cars of produce, raised with infinite pains and at infinite expense, rotting on the tracks, they are criminals.

Now don't let the workers who read COMFORT get it into their heads that I am trying to hit any honest toiler, for I am not. I'm the friend of every man who is honest and law-abiding and the enemy of every slacker who in this hour of world agony, takes advantage of a starving universe by putting his own petty interests and ambitions above that of all other suffering humans. While we were at war, for a while at least, we seemed to be a united, unselfish people, but, wearying of swatting Germans, we started in to plunder, pillage and gas one another. All that is vile, ugly and contemptible, mean and debased has seized upon us since the armistice was signed, and what the Kaiser could not do we are rapidly doing to ourselves. Only two things will save this country—thrift and patience. Boosting wages will get us nowhere. They have done that in Europe until today the Russian rouble is not worth a cent. Striking only irritates, for it cuts down production (the only thing that can save us) and makes those suffering from high prices, whose wages are low, suffer fifty times more. A strike does not punish the rich, but it punishes everyone else, especially those of scanty means, and unless this striking nuisance stops we shall have conditions similar to those in Russia. You idiots who get your dope from the Red Jew sheets of Kansas and other sections had better learn right now that the Soviet system has failed as it must fail utterly in any community except among some primitive tribe of Indians. Trotzky, who hated militarism because it was not his militarism, has raised the greatest army in the world. You could not put a strike over on him without being blown to bits. Workers' committees or soviets no longer run industrial establishments in Russia. Trotzy found that scheme did not work, so he abolished them and placed skilled managers in charge. So the dreams of the poor dupes who think they can take over and run all the "capitalistic" industries, as they call them, and get results, have vanished. Listen to Trotzky: "Mobilization is more necessary now than it was formerly because we have to deal with a peasant population which cannot be utilized to the fullest extent by any other means than military discipline." Military discipline for everybody—there you have Bolshevism. You see, it is easy to theorize but a very different proposition when work must be done and millions fed and housed. Then dreams vanish and it's work or be shot.

It took this country fourteen years to get back to normal after the Civil War, which was only a storm in a teacup compared to the late great upset, and if you'd practice self-denial, cut out jazzing, striking, loafing and extravagance, and work with the spirit that animated you during the war, we'd again be back to normal in a few years. Canada for ten years has had a law providing for compulsory mediation in all disputes affecting industries of a public character. Under this law, in the course of eight years, out of 177 disputes, all but 19 were satisfactorily settled without any strike. But the Reds want strikes and they want strikes to fail, so they can generate more hate and discontent. They want the One Big Union, which is to consist of Reds, criminals and every sorehead and bum in the land. This union of home-bred Trotzkys will be a "government" of a minority for a minority by a minority, and loot and plunder will be its watchwords. These freaks forget that we already have One Big Union, the United States of America, which combines all classes and all creeds. We are not going to swap that Union, which has as its basis the best thoughts, ideals and ideas of the greatest men that ever lived, for anything Bill Heywood or Morris Hillquit can give us.

Soon we shall have a new government, but I warn you that governments can only tax and make laws. They can spend but cannot produce. Your salvation lies with yourselves. We are suffering not from too little but from floods of money that represent little of actual value. The war destroyed two hundred billion dollars' worth of property, and we can only replace that property by years of toil. Before the war, for every dollar there was a dollar's worth of marketable goods. During the war, everything went into destruction and nothing into construction. That is why we are short of houses and everything except Reds, lunatics and politicians. The goods destroyed have got to be replaced and the water pumped out of the dollar, the pound, the franc, the lira, the mark, the rouble, until we again have goods equivalent to the money in circulation. Royal Meeker, the Commissioner of Labor Statistics, in the Labor Review, says: "It will take a long time to deflate the world's inflated currencies or to inflate the world's deflated supply of goods. The profiteer is being blamed on all hands for the increase in prices (Topeka, Kansas, please take note). Undoubtedly profiteering of the most reprehensible sort has existed and does exist today, but the profiteer is the result of ever-increasing prices rather than the cause thereof. His influence in boosting prices is negligible. If all the profiteers in the world could be apprehended and thrown into jail or lined up and shot, it would have no appreciable influence on prices."

Organized labor will tell you there is no law to stop a man from quitting work if he wants to. Right, old chap, but if a man has a right to quit, it logically follows that another man has a right to begin work. The world's cupboard is empty and there is a shortage of food and necessaries all over the globe, and if the American working man won't work, let in the foreigner who will. An enormous hotel is being built in Chicago. The gentlemen who are constructing it ride to work in taxis. Good! Soon, I hope, they will have limousines. But there are certain natural and economic laws and as a result of this auto craze so much glass is going into windshields, so much steel into auto construction that hundreds of buildings are standing empty. For lack of steel, glass, etc., building is almost at a standstill. When the autos are constructed, owing to a shortage of tens of thousands of freight cars, the railroads can't haul them. Now laugh! 33,000 men and boys have left New York farms and rushed to the cities during the last year. Hoover, one of the few sane men in a crazy world, says that if things go on at their present rate we shall soon be importing food. With eight dollars a day for washing a ceiling and ten for shoveling snow, no wonder farmers, who are paying $80 a ton for feed for their cows, are deserting their farms or reducing their crop acreage 25 per cent. But here's the joke. When Hiram and Mandy get to the city, there is not a roof to be had at any price to cover their heads, and soon there will be nothing for them to eat. You might just as well realize here and now that we are all up against it. The world is sick and there is no way out except by work, faith, patience, good humor, loyalty to one's country and one's God and remember that the wretches who are rocking the national boat and trying to push us into war to oblige some of our noisy foreign boarders, and spill us all while we are striving desperately hard to get to shore, are traitors to humanity and deserve a traitor's fate. P. S. Sugar in South America is fifty cents a pound, so don't get excited.

Don't forget that Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books may still be had. Start in at once to obtain them—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers, and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk covers, either one for a club of three subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues and the best gifts in the world.

My Picture Book, too, has started a deluge of inquiries: Is Billy the Goat my daughter? Is Maria her ma? Is there an Aunt Charlie? Is the big boy in the Picture Book my only baby? I have had a little leaflet specially printed answering all these questions fully, and those who are interested will find the same in every copy of the four Uncle Charlie books sent out this season.

Now for the letters.

DETROIT, MICH.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

May I say a word about the wholesale desertion of the farm for the city? You young men and women in leaving the farm are only jumping out of the frying pan into the fire and that you will find out when it is too late. I have lived on the farm and in the city and know what I am talking about. Young men who come here do not know what it costs to live and are willing to accept work and wages that a city man with a family cannot live on. The countryman knows little about the mechanical work required in the cities and the city mechanic makes but a poor farm hand. By flocking to the city you force down production on the farm and leave us people in the cities less to live upon, forcing the prices of food ever higher and higher. What we need today is not higher wages but more product, especially food products, revive capital punishment for food gougers and put honest men in office. But why do you farmers let your sons and daughters come to the city? It is because you do not make life worth while for them and give them a chance to make a living. Because you have grown old you think the young folks do not need any amusement, but if they do, and if you don't give it to them, they will go where they can get it. Have the old-time parties, barn dances and husking bees, organize baseball clubs, farm improvement clubs, trap shooting, etc. Let us have more sunshine on the farm and in the world, so that we may live our lives to the fullest.

SAM D. KAUFFMAN.

Sam, you are a hero in war and a philosopher and live wire in peace. Your letter is so full of good, sound, common sense that I am going to appoint you a committee of one to take fifty thousand people out of Detroit, where they don't belong, and put them on the farms where they do belong. There is a wild-eyed, on-to-the-city movement, which is leaving farm lands desolate and emptying the old homestead of its young people. Father and mother will hang on until they can work no more and death claims them. And the people who rushed to the cities will find—what? Vice and disease, doorsteps to sleep on, for there are positively no houses and no rooms to be rented unless you are a millionaire, and eventually food not to be had at any price. We can live without automobiles, we can live without a majority of so-called necessaries, but we cannot live without food. I have at least half a ton of literature filed away on this subject and about a quarter of a ton is scattered on my bed. And, summed up, what does it amount to? Take your own case, Sam. Why don't you practice what you preach and set a good example to the others? You would be far more useful on the farm than in the city, but I notice you are not there. The lure of the city has existed all through the ages and you cannot combat it, unless you go Bolshevik. Then the Red Army would draft fifty thousand Detroiters, and if they did not want to go back to the farms they would shoot them back. None of us approves of those methods. We all want to follow our own sweet wills, and by doing so, as a rule (for of course we never will take anybody's advice) we make a horrible muss of things. When potatoes become ten dollars apiece, as they will do, and people find that if they stay in the cities they will die of starvation, then and not until then will they rush back to the soil and try and raise the food which alone will sustain them. Secretary of Agriculture Meredith has issued a warning that there will be an acute shortage of food during the coming winter. This is largely due to the lack of farm labor, which is only 72 per cent of normal in spite of high increase in wages. Agriculture is America's greatest industry. Allow it to decay and we decay with it. In 1800 the farm population of America was 94 per cent. Think of it, 94 on the farms to every six in the cities. Today there are only 30 per cent of our people in the country and 70 per cent are huddled in these loathsome wildernesses of bricks, mortar, misery and unGodliness. Every city door is closed tight and nobody knows or cares who his next door neighbor is. People are selfish, self-centered, there is no neighborliness, no community life. There is no company for the young men except the harlot of the street, no company for the young girl except the diseased male vamp of the sidewalk. There are the churches, but only the fear of hell or a shotgun will get the young people into church these days. The vicious movies with their

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

What Makes Beauty?

"OH, if I only had a mouth like Cora's, wouldn't I be happy! Isn't she lucky to be such a beauty?" And the girl in front of me, on the street-car sighed a tremendous sigh as she turned to her companion. I took a critical look at her, then I smiled to myself. The "Cora" she was envying stood in the aisle a few seats off. Pretty, to be sure; a lovely mouth, one must admit; yet, as a matter of fact, none of her features were as clear-cut as those of the envying friend, and taken as a whole her face was not nearly so attractive.

Yet it was perfectly true that at a casual glance she would have been estimated as a beauty,

KEEP A MEAL SHAKER AT HAND FOR YOUR TOILET.

while the other girl would have been lightly passed over as "nice-enough looking." What was the reason? Ah, that's what I want to tell you.

Cora gave one the impression of fragrant cleanliness, of a dainty toilet. There were no little hairs straggling in her neck; her hair was soft, lustrous and resilient, which means that it did not mass together but that each hair was a live separate belonging. Everything about her was fresh and lovely, from the sheer organdie collar at her neck to her well-kept shoes and her smooth, perfectly fitting stockings. Her eyebrows lay in a smooth, lustrous line, her teeth were white and perfectly cared for, and her finger-nails, as she turned the pages of her Latin grammar, were beautifully kept.

That was just the difference, girls. Sue, the other girl, with twice the natural assets, was dressed hurriedly; she gave the impression of a nice girl who had hurried to get ready for school and who didn't think much about how she looked. There were a few stray locks—nothing serious, but just enough to take away any suggestion of perfect grooming. Her nails were blunt though clean, her hair had no luster, and her clothes showed no care given to the little niceties.

That was the only difference between the girl who was "a beauty" and the girl who was not.

It pays, girls, to be dainty. We should not think about ourselves unduly, and once we are dressed and ready to meet the rest of the world we should forget our appearance. But there is no harm, but a real duty, in taking time at our toilet to care for all the little niceties so that we may properly dismiss any thought of our appearance from our minds yet know that nothing is awry and nothing about us suggests carelessness.

I know an elderly woman, mother of fourteen children, who has a complexion which her daughters envy. You may be quite sure she has no time for dawdling over her toilet or for beauty luxuries, yet all her life she has methodically rubbed her face with corn-meal after washing with tepid water, and dried it in this manner, and it has kept her skin as smooth and perfect almost as a baby's. She has not ruined it with too much soap. It is a good idea to keep a "shaker" of corn-meal or almond meal on your toilet table and use it for hands and face after bathing, to soften and whiten the skin. The meal will remove soil without injuring the skin.

Be careful, then, girls, about the little things. Make yourself spotlessly clean in the morning, taking, of course, a complete body bath—a sponge bath will be enough in the morning, but you should take a warm, cleansing bath at night—keep your hair clean and carefully brushed, your eyebrows shaped, your nails perfectly cared for, and put on your clothes with care. Who knows that you, too, may not be a beauty?

Answers to Questions

A COUNTRY GIRL.—No, indeed, peroxide and ammonia will not injure the arms. Dampen one day with the peroxide, and one day with the ammonia. Ask your druggist for peroxide of hydrogen, and for toilet ammonia.

TEXAS BLUE EYES.—It is not advisable to undertake a course of exercises while starting on the milk diet. The latter is a form of what is called "forced feeding," and your stomach needs to be undisturbed in its labors, while exercise takes the blood away from the stomach and impedes digestion. That is the reason one does not, even on an ordinary diet, exercise right after meals, or just before meals. It would be better for you either to take a regular course of the exercises you have in mind, say for three weeks, regularly, several times a day, working at them conscientiously; then to stop and take the milk diet, being as lazy as possible while doing so; or vice versa. In the milk sanitariums, the patients are put to bed and kept there, where they lie and doze and laze and save every ounce of energy and flesh that the milk diet creates. You do not need to go to this extreme, but may go about your ordinary undertakings, only being careful not to take violent exercise. The milk should be sweet—this is in answer to another of your questions—and not skimmed milk. Of course, if you live in the country, the whole milk just as it comes from the cow is much richer than what we of the city mean by unskimmed milk. You can take off part of the cream. You say sweet milk does not seem to agree with you. This is probably because your stomach is not quite in good condition—it may be acid, and so curdle the milk. Milk diet experts say that when milk "does not agree," that indicates the most urgent need for that special diet. Milk is not a beverage, but a food, and cannot be taken in any quantity in conjunction with solid food, for that gives the stomach too much to do and results in discomfort. You should eliminate solid food while living on the milk, and should be careful to "chew" every mouthful of the milk before swallowing, that it may be well mixed with the saliva which is necessary to its complete digestion. To begin with, take a glass and a half of milk every hour until about 3.30 or 4 in the afternoon, beginning, say, at 7.30 or 8 in the morning. Then eat a light supper about 6.30, and drink a couple of glasses of water between that hour and going to bed. Also drink a couple of glasses of hot water on rising in the morning. Since you will not be exercising, it is a good idea to put half-a-dozen prunes to soak at night in a tumbler of water and in the morning chew the prunes thoroughly and drink the juice. Do this about fifteen minutes before taking your first glass of milk. I wish you luck in your undertaking.

ANXIOUS GIRL.—I wonder if when the skin peels, as you say, about your finger nails, you pull the skin off? Well, don't any more. Every night before you go to bed, anoint the skin about the nails with vaseline to soften it. Rub a little on at any time in the day when you do not have to use your fingers for a little time. Keeping the skin soft will prevent its peeling. Then if it does crack and a hangnail appears, clip it gently and immediately with a pair of sharp manicure scissors—do not under any circumstances pull it off. It wouldn't be a bad idea for you to soak your finger nails in olive oil once a day. Use a cup so that you will not have to have a great quantity of oil, and put your finger-ends in the oil, letting them soak for ten or fifteen minutes. What you need is more oil in your skin, I think. Do you use a steel nail-cleaner? Don't! Buy yourself an orange-wood stick, and always soak your nails for a minute or two before cleaning, so that you can use the stick very gently, being careful not to break the skin beneath the nail. Don't use strong soap on your hands.

ANXIOUS GIRL.—Fourteen is pretty young to go to dances, isn't it? But if your father and mother approve and you only dance with your brother and the friend your family approve, I expect it is lots of fun. What should you say when your partner thanks you for a dance? Why, if he merely says, "Thank you" as he bows and leaves you, all you need do is smile. But if he says, "That was a fine dance—thank you," or, "I certainly enjoyed that fox-trot—thank you," you might say, "So did I," or "Wasn't the music good?" or, "It's fun dancing when the floor is so good," or "You dance so well, it is fun dancing with you." It isn't really necessary to say anything, if your partner is just leaving for the next dance with somebody else. A smile is sufficient. In answer to your other question—yes, indeed, it is always correct to give your seat to an older person. If the boy who gave you his seat is standing by you, you can say to him in an undertone, as you give your seat to the elderly person, "You don't mind, do you? I can't feel comfortable sitting down when an older person is standing," or something like that. You sound like a very nice girl. I hope you have lots of fun this summer, and make just the pleasantest friends.

WASHINGTON STATE.—Yes, indeed, ammonia will take your breath away. It isn't meant to inhale, my dear, although when people have fainted we place a bottle of ammonia under their noses to bring them to. It is strong, just as you say, but it takes something strong to kill hair roots. It will also burn a sensitive skin, though most skins can stand an every-other-day application without discomfort. Try it on the hairy spot—your arm or your face—dampening the hair and letting the ammonia dry on. The next day use the peroxide, the next day the ammonia, and so on. If the ammonia irritates the skin after a few applications, stop the treatment for a few days and apply a cold cream or a zinc oxide ointment. It is possible you may have to dilute the ammonia, but this takes away part of its killing strength.

GEORGIA GIRL.—A red face probably comes from imperfect circulation, in your case. You say, too, that the "veins" in your face are large. Do you mean on the temple where the veins show? I suggest that you be careful about violent exercise—take things easy, especially in warm weather. Take a cool sponge bath in the morning, then powder the body thoroughly. Don't wear tight clothes. See that your corset is very low-busted and do not have it tight. Your shoes should be comforable and there should be no tight waistbands, neck-bands, garters, etc. Don't wear round garters, they are the worst things in the world for your circulation; you must wear side garters either attached to your corset, or attached to a washable belt worn around your waist. With attention to all these details, the condition of your veins should not be so noticeable. You speak of having them "removed with an electric needle." I do not quite understand you. You aren't talking about enlarged pores, instead of veins, are you? If it should chance that you are speaking about pores, then the use of cold water to dash on the face, after a thorough cleaning, and the avoidance of hot water, will help greatly. The electric needle is not used for either condition, however. We use the electric needle to remove hairs and moles, and sometimes in the treatment of scars.

E. L. K.—Reduce your bust? Why, my dear, it is only 34. What do you want to reduce it for? By another year, you will be writing me asking how to increase its size. Thirty-four is a very small bust, and you shouldn't reduce. You say your hips are thirty-eight—that is a very good size for your hips, and eventually your bust will no doubt increase to the same size, since bust and hips should be the same measurement, with the waist ten inches smaller. Your waist should be about 28 eventually, though it may be smaller now. No, indeed, you do not weigh too much for your height and age. But let the bust alone!

EASTON.—An itching scalp may come from a number of causes. Too strong soap used in one's shampoo leaves an itching scalp sometimes. In shampooing, use a white household soap, shave into boiling water, let stand over heat until dissolved, then cool slightly and pour on the head a little at a time, massaging and rubbing both scalp and hair and squeezing off the soiled lather. Then rinse well, and apply some more of the shampoo liquid, finally rinsing many times in warm water, tepid water and finally, after every particle of soap is out of the hair, in cool water. Brush the hair gently. Don't use a wire brush on your scalp but a brush of only medium stiffness. See that it is cleaned after every brushing, by shaking and brushing of the bristles; and that it is washed and thoroughly dried at least twice a week. Too vigorous brushing with a stiff brush will often break and irritate the scalp. Massaging the scalp will improve its health. I suggest that you dip the finger tips in warm oil before massaging, so that the scalp gets a little oil daily. Try not to get oil on the hair—if you just barely dip the fingers, and then massage for some time, the scalp will absorb the oil and there will be no greasiness of the hair.

ETTA LUELLA.—See answer above. You should be very careful about your diet. Eat plenty of green vegetables and fresh fruits, good bread and butter, drink milk, eat cream on cereals, drink quantities of water between meals and see that the bowels move regularly—not with cathartics but by diet and exercise. Try soaking half-a-dozen prunes each night and eating them next morning—see answer to "Texas Blue Eyes." An egg shampoo would be good for your scalp instead of a soap shampoo.

CURLY LOCKS.—What do you mean by a "pug"? Do you mean the hair coiled at the neck, like a grown-up person's? If so, I do not think it the appropriate hairdressing for a girl of fifteen, even if, as you say, she does not go to school. But why doesn't she go to school? My, what a lot she is missing—fun, as well as education. Go to school just as long as possible. Every month means a lot more learned and a lot more that you will get out of life later, and a lot more friends that you will make. Don't quit school until you just have to, and if you have quit, go back! About the hair, many fashionable girls of fifteen wear their hair down their back in braids—that seems to be the favored way; but you can braid it and turn it under at the neck, tying with a big bow; or if your hair is rather short you can part it in the middle of the back, brush each half toward the ear, then braid, and tie the end of each braid to the beginning of the other next the head, using a big bow for each of the two tyings. This is only pretty where the hair is short so that the braid is just about long enough to reach from one side of the head to the other.

WORRIED.—Both the scarlet fever and the "flu" have had a bad effect on your hair, and you need, now, to give the scalp thorough attention. Probably your hair is dry so I should not wash it more than once in three weeks, being careful at the time of a shampoo to thoroughly rinse it many, many times. It would be a good idea for you to anoint the scalp—not the hair—with olive oil the night before a shampoo, tying your head up in a towel. Use a medicine dropper, if you have one, and run it along the part, then make another part and do the same, and continue until the scalp is all anointed. This softens any dandruff and makes it come away. Massage the scalp twice a day, with the hair hanging loose. To massage the scalp, slip the fingers beneath the hair next the scalp, on each side of the head, and pressing firmly move the scalp back and forth on the skull. Do not lift the fingers. Keep changing the position of the fingers until the entire scalp has been treated in this way. This sets the blood circulating and restores a healthy condition to the scalp. You say you are in good health now, so that your scalp and hair will probably begin to recover also. Be sure to keep yourself in healthy condition, bowels moving at least once and preferably twice daily, eating only at meals and then chewing your food thoroughly, drinking plenty of water between meals, and getting lots of sleep at night in a room with the windows open. Don't be discouraged; it takes a little time after illness before the body gets back to normal again.

IT PAYS TO KEEP YOUR NAILS NOT ONLY CLEAN BUT ATTRACTIVELY SHAPED AND WELL CARED FOR.

SAGE TEA TURNS GRAY HAIR DARK

If Mixed with Sulphur It Darkens so Naturally Nobody can Tell.

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome. Nowadays, by asking at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound," you will get a large bottle of this famous old recipe, improved by the addition of other ingredients, at a small cost.

Don't stay gray! Try it! No one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, glossy and attractive.

What to Do When Anyone Faints

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THERE is nothing more alarming to the bystander than to see anyone faint, and the average person feels very helpless and is almost afraid to offer any assistance for fear he should do the wrong thing. What is usually done is lift the sufferer to a couch and place a pillow under the head. Now this is all wrong for most of such attacks are caused by lack of blood in the brain brought on by intense fatigue, shock, extreme fright or very severe pain. The head, therefore, should not be raised above the level of the body. If the sufferer has fallen on the floor, if possible let him remain there until he recovers consciousness.

Loosen the clothing especially about the neck so that the throat will not be constricted by pressure. Then sprinkle a little cold water on the forehead and hold a bottle of smelling salts to the nose and as soon as possible give a teaspoonful of aromatic spirits of ammonia in a third of a glass of water. If you have not the ammonia, a cup of hot black coffee is also an excellent restorative when the patient is able to swallow.

When you see a person unconscious and the face is flushed, the attack is something more serious than a faint and should be treated very differently. A doctor should be sent for without delaying a moment, for in all probability this is apoplexy which requires immediate attention. Lay the sufferer on his back and raise the head and shoulders with a thick pillow and apply a cloth wet with cold water or pounded ice wrapped in a cloth to the head. Do not give any kind of stimulant for in this condition it does more harm than good.

In hot weather an unconscious condition is sometimes due to sunstroke. This differs from an ordinary faint in that the skin is intensely hot and dry and there is a very high temperature, the eyes are bloodshot and the pulse rapid and weak. If this terrible heat continues it is exceedingly dangerous and even minutes are important in this condition. First get the sufferer in the shade and then send some one for a doctor at once. Raise the patient's head with a pillow, a cushion or even a coat rolled up. Loosen the clothing around the neck and chest and dash cold water on the skin. Put a towel dripping with ice water or hold cracked ice on top of the head, and continue this treatment until the patient revives or the physician comes.

what the girls had said. Then they had to tell him the truth. If you don't tell them someone else will.

I am going to bring up a subject I have never seen in print and that is the borrowing habit. I am willing to loan anything but with the present H. C. O. L. I want it returned. I have a neighbor who is always borrowing, a cup of sugar, cup of coffee, flour, potatoes, and so on, but never returns anything or else in a smaller quantity than borrowed. They even borrow three or four eggs or a few slices of ham or bacon as they say they have nothing for their father's breakfast. They also borrow loaves of bread. Now what I want to know is, have I done right in telling them I am nearly out of the article for which they come. We get our groceries only three times a week and have to keep things on hand. What would you do with neighbors like mine?

Long live Mrs. Wilkinson and may her future years be filled with pleasure and brightness.

ALWAYS CHEERFUL.

Thanks, Always Cheerful, for your kind wishes. I think I'd let "father" go without his bacon and eggs some morning. Your letter reminds me of a little poem I saw the other day. It doesn't refer to borrowing groceries, neither is it as highbrow as Shakespeare's "Neither a borrower nor a lender be," but the idea is the same. This is the poem:

"I once had money and a friend;
On both I set great store.
I loaned my money to my friend,
And took his note therefor.

"I asked my money of my friend,
And naught but words I got.
I lost my money and my friend,
For sue him I would not.

"If I had money and a friend,
As I had once before,
I'd keep my money and my friend
And play the fool no more."

brother-in-law's baby. I should like to see their picture in COMFORT. My baby's name is Ocea Maxine Brill. She is at the left of the picture.

With best wishes to COMFORT,

MRS. BERLE BRILL.

IRONTON, O.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I received my April number of "COMFORT" last Wednesday and on Thursday I received the sad news of Mr. S. C. Sheppard's death in an Idaho hospital; whither he had gone to be operated on for appendicitis. He wrote me that he did not expect to survive the operation as he had a weak heart and both his parents died of heart trouble.

You will readily remember him, I am sure, as his name is mentioned in several of the "Sisters'." letters in April COMFORT. He wrote the interesting letter from Utah in the Christmas number, and was an ardent admirer of Uncle Charlie, as we all are.

Mr. Sheppard was one of the noblest men I ever knew and it seems sad that he has gone from us, for our world needs that kind of men.

If you will kindly forward the addresses of "Virginia Rose" and "Frances," I will write them. Thanking you in advance for same, I remain,

Your "COMFORT" Sister, G. L.

Dear G. L.—Thank you for letting us know of Mr. Sheppard's death. The announcement of this will be received by the sisters with sorrow as it was by me, for his interesting letters made us feel as though he "belonged" to us.—Ed.

PRINCETON, N. J.

GOOD EVENING, LADIES AND GENTS:

It does seem good to take an active part in one of your monthly meetings again!

Come, Criss, sit at my right hand and COMFORT Reader at my left and help me out when I can't think of the right word to say.

COMFORT Reader, I will think Mrs. Wilkinson a pretty poor sport if she doesn't publish her picture after that rising vote you secured several months ago. I dare her to publish it for you will all get an agreeable surprise. You mustn't take everything she says about herself too seriously for some folks are just naturally modest.

Yes, Eva, I tried to become familiar with the different varieties of citrus fruits in Florida by eating every kind that was handed to me. I even tried to like the guava but I'll never forget my first, and last, experience with the Jamaica or custard apple—I think that was the name. We were visiting a citrus grove and the caretaker showed us a Jamaica apple tree which had only three or four apples left on it. As we had never tasted this fruit he picked a couple, thinking he was giving us a special treat. It was soft inside, like custard, with a sweet taste flavored like perfumery. I thought I could get away with any kind of fruit but this time I felt myself getting sicker by the minute so after taking a few bites I threw it in the bushes when the man's back was turned, but felt absolutely guilty in wasting his precious fruit.

Thanks, Kate, for asking about Mr. X. I've been dying to tell! My dear, the sad part of that affair was that a few months after my return to Minnesota I received an announcement of his marriage to an old sweetheart. The only thing which saved my faith in men was the fact that he renewed his friendship with this girl after my visit to Los Angeles.

"B," you're all right. The liking is mutual. You have Mrs. W's "mental caliber" sized up right although it would be poor policy for her to agree with anyone in particular when an argument is on.

On reaching the entrance to Yellowstone Park we went to the Wylie Camp Headquarters where we were assigned seats in a stage for at that time no autos were allowed in the park. All tourists rode in stage coaches drawn by four or six horses. These stages were numbered so each morning when your particular number was called out you and the others assigned to it must be ready to climb in and start off for a thirty-mile drive.

The trip through the Park and return took us five days. At night we camped in the Wylie tent villages. The first part of the evenings was spent watching the bears around the dump piles and later on by sitting around a huge camp fire where corn was popped, songs were sung and stories were told. Every night we stopped at a different camp where the tourists were given an enjoyable time. The scenery all through the park was most beautiful but the hot springs and geysers were the chief centers of attraction.

While driving through the park the tourists often ask foolish questions and the drivers are always willing to give satisfactory answers. As soon as you start out on your trip you ask, "Oh, Mr. Driver, where does this road go?" and he kindly replies, "It doesn't go anywhere. It always stays here." And later on, "Oh, Mr. Driver, are all those beautiful flowers wild?" and he replies most solemnly, "Yes, they are all wild but perfectly harmless." On being asked if mosquitoes ever got very bad, a driver replied, "Do they? Well, I guess! Only last week a party of campers were going by here leading a cow and calf behind the wagon. They camped near the lake and the next morning when they looked for the cow they found the mosquitoes had eaten her up and were ringing the bell for the calf."

Just beyond Old Faithful Inn you pass a lot of dead pine trees. While passing them you ask, "What killed all those fine trees?" He looks you over with a twinkling eye and says, "Why a short time ago a party of school teachers were touring the Park and had a picnic under those trees. Soon after it was noticed the trees began to die. On being examined by a botanist it was discovered that they had been talked to death."

Nuff said, so I'll stop before I talk the sisters to death, too.

NELLE L. FISCHER.

HELLO EVERYBODY:

Our get-together corner is worth its weight in pickles and if the papers have to be cut down, as threatened, I shall agree with the old captain who said, "Someting iss rotten vot ain't in Denmark." Anything that cloth may be made of will do as well for paper pulp and I think if the present styles keep up, cloth may be done away with entirely, providing we can get henskin or something of which to make wider belts. Let us advocate the raising of fiber flax that our chief source of education and information may stay with us.

We "flu" last winter and for eight weeks my mouth looked like an inverted breve but I am back on the job again—the task so many of you have given me—ready to be mother-chum to orphans, big sister to the girlies, adviser to home makers, cheer giver to grandma-ladies, eyes and ears for shut-ins and a COMFORT sister to all—who send stamped envelopes.

I receive many begging letters and am so sorry that I cannot help you financially but I will tell you how to use the things you have to the best advantage. Two of the greatest possibilities are stocking tops and flour sacks. From stockings make wrapper drawers for baby,

How well it Pays

To beautify the teeth

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Millions of people are cleaning teeth in a new way. They are getting new results—results you envy, maybe. In every circle nowadays you see pearly teeth.

Find out how folks get them. Try this method for ten days and see what your own teeth show.

They combat film

Dental science has found a way to combat film on teeth. And film causes most tooth troubles.

Film is that viscous coat—you feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

It is this film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Why old ways fail

The ordinary dentifrice cannot dissolve film, so brushing has left much of it intact. Thus millions of people have found that brushed teeth discolor and decay.

Now, after years of searching, science has found a way to combat film. Able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Today leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste made to meet every modern requirement. It has brought to millions a new era in teeth cleaning.

A ten-day test will show

Pepsodent proves itself. The results are clear and quick. So the policy is to send a 10-Day Tube to everyone who asks, and a book explaining all its unique effects.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed barred. But science has discovered a harmless activating method, so active pepsin can be every day applied.

Compare the results with old methods and let your teeth decide.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

You will be amazed. In ten days you will know the way to whiter, safer teeth. Cut out the coupon, else you may forget.

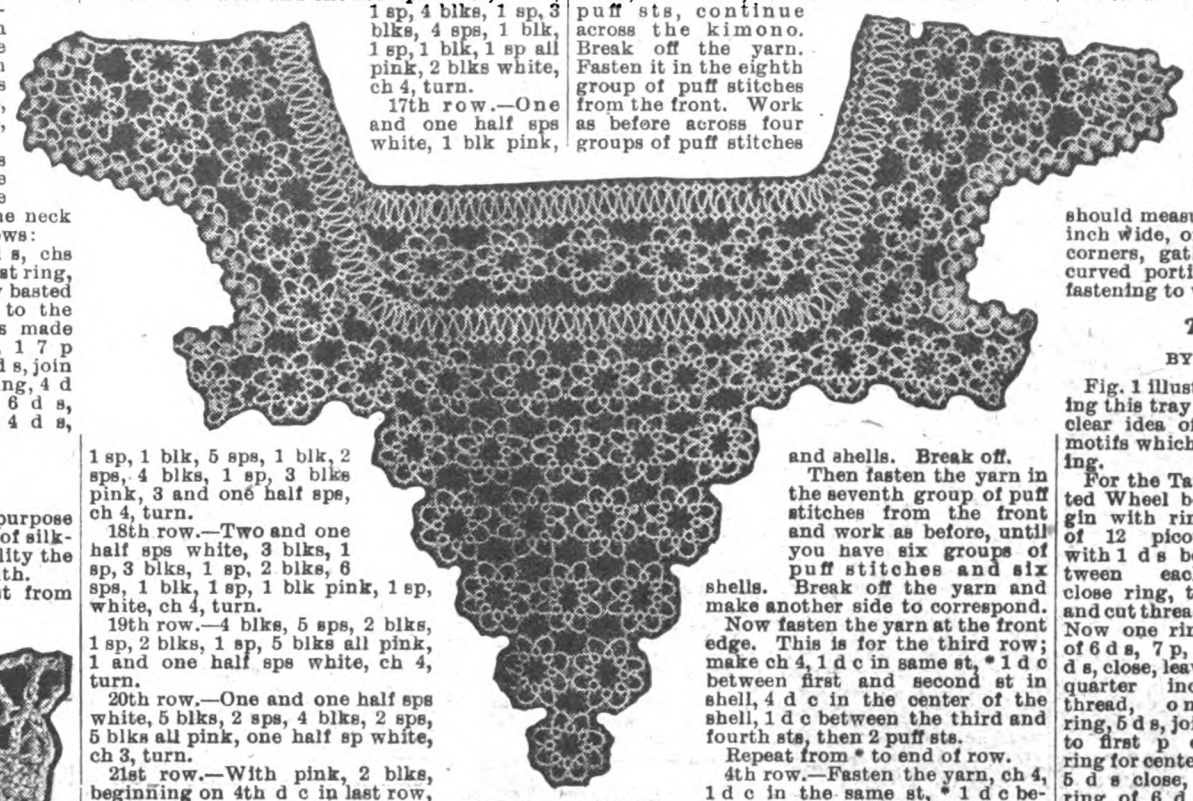
Tatted Night Gown Yoke & Other Designs



Tatted Nightgown Yoke

BY EVA MAE BELL.

THIS handsome yoke is made by arranging tatted wheels in an unusually attractive way. The arrangement of the front point is plainly shown while the points over the shoulders are made by adding three medallions to the shoulder bands. The neck is edged with an insertion made as follows:

Ring 5 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, 1 p, 5 d s, chs 9 d s, 1 ring, 1 ch, 1 ring joined to the first ring, the yoke should be laid out and carefully basted to a paper and this insertion joined to the wheels as it is made, edging on sleeve is made as follows; 1 small 7 p ring, ch of 4 d s, 1 7 p ring, ch 3 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 6 d s, 1 p, 3 d s, join to center p of second ring, 4 d s, 1, 7 p ring, 4 d s, 1, 7 p ring, 4 d s, join to picot of ch, 6 d s, join to second picot of ch, 6 d s, 1 p, 4 d s, joined to ring, repeat.

CHARITY KINCHEN.

Instead of Beading

If one finds it difficult to get the usual lace beadings for under garments, try using insertion an inch and a half wide, folded lengthwise.

To use this put the raw edge between the folded edge and stitch in place.

Run the ribbon through the last casing and one will have a very dainty finish.

2nd row.—Ch 3, 1 d c in first in last row, ch 1, 2 d c on d c, * ch 1, 1 d c in second sp, ch 1, 1 d c in third sp, ch 1, 2 d c on d c, repeat from * to end of row, making 5 widenings in all.

Continue working in this way widening at beginning and ending of each row and at 5 widening until 12 rows are completed.

Make the fronts of the yoke a little deeper by crocheting two rows from the front edge to the first widening. Now take the blue yarn and make a yoke nearly like the pink one. This is for the lining yoke.

Baste the lining and outside yokes together, making each stitch in one fit on the other. Then take yarn for body and the large crochet hook.

Fasten in the first sp in the bottom of the yoke, through both the yokes; make three chains and five d c, in the same sp, 1 d c in the next sp, two puff stitches in the next. (To make a puff stitch, throw your yarn over the hook, draw a loop through space; repeat twice through the same space, which makes seven loops on the hook; throw the yarn over the hook, draw through all the loops at once and make one chain: continue * 1 d c in next sp, 4 d c, in the next 2 puff sts in the next. Repeat from * to end of row, on each front there should be five groups of shell stitches and puff stitches, eight on each shoulder and 11 across the back. Break off the yarn at the end of each row.

Next fasten the yarn in the center of the sixth shell (four d c) from the front.

Ch 3, 4 d c in same sp, 2 puff sts in the center of 2 in the previous row, 4 d c in center of next shell, repeat until one has 8 groups of puff sts.

Break off the yarn. Working on this short row, make another exactly like it; these two rows are for the shoulder, and another shoulder should be made to correspond.

Next fasten the yarn in the first stitch at the front, make ch 3, shell 4 d c in each shell and 2 puff sts, continue across the kimono. Break off the yarn. Fasten it in the eighth group of puff stitches from the front. Work as before across four groups of puff stitches and shells. Break off.

Then fasten the yarn in the seventh group of puff stitches from the front and work as before, until you have six groups of puff stitches and six shells. Break off the yarn and make another side to correspond.

Now fasten the yarn at the front edge. This is for the third row; make ch 4, 1 d c in same st, * 1 d c between first and second st in shell, 4 d c in the center of the shell, 1 d c between the third and fourth sts, then 2 puff sts.

Repeat from * to end of row.

4th row.—Fasten the yarn, ch 4, 1 d c in the same st, * 1 d c between the first and second sts in the shell, 1 d c between the second and third sts in shell, 4 d c in the center, 1 d c between the fourth and fifth sts in the shell, 1 d c between the fifth and sixth sts in shell, making 8 sts in the shell just made; 2 puff sts. Repeat from * to end of row.

5th and 6th rows.—Fasten yarn, make ch 4 and 1 d c, in same st, * make 4 d c in center, after which make 1 d c between every 2 d c again; make 2 puff sts. Repeat from * to end of row.

7th and 8th rows.—Fasten yarn, ch 4 1 d c in the same st, * sk the first 2 d c, make 1 d c between the second and third, and then between every 2 d c until you reach center; make 4 d c in the center and one between every 2 except the last 2; make 2 puff sts. Repeat from * to end of row.

12th row.—Fasten yarn, ch 4, 1 d c, in the same space, make 5 groups of shells and puff sts, ch 10, sk 8 groups of shells and puff sts, fasten in 9th puff st, work across the back, and after making 11 puff sts, make a ch of 10; sk 8 groups and work across the front.

13th to 17th rows.—Work as in the previous rows, making 2 shells of 4 d c with 2 puff sts between on the ch of 10.

Edge kimono with blue by mahing a crazy st (a crazy st consists of 1 s c, ch 3, 3 d c) in every third st, catch the two yokes together. Finish with ribbon rosettes.

An Inexpensive Cushion Cover

Take a square of muslin or other white goods, (I use flour sacks) 20x20 inches. Draw eight threads, leave nine, draw eight more and repeat till whole square is drawn each way. Now thread a coarse needle with colored sansilk, begin at one corner and work a simple over and over stitch diagonally to other corner, by putting the needle under the solid squares from the same side each time which draws thread over the open spaces, draw thread reasonably tight and be careful to work first line straight. Now turn and work back crossing thread under solid squares and over open spaces, repeat till four rows are worked. Change thread for contrasting colors and work four more, repeat till square is worked, now begin at opposite corners and work across changing colors of thread every four rows which throws it into squares. Line and ruffle with white or if preferred colored silk, voile, or plain gingham can be used with good effect.

MISS NELLIE GRAHAM.

Roses of Silk or Satin

Various sized roses of either silk or satin are not difficult to make and they furnish a fascinating change of work for the needlewoman.

Their uses are many, as in small sizes they can be placed on children's hats, and for finishing small pincushions, etc.

Large flowers are now used on baskets, knitting and school bags.

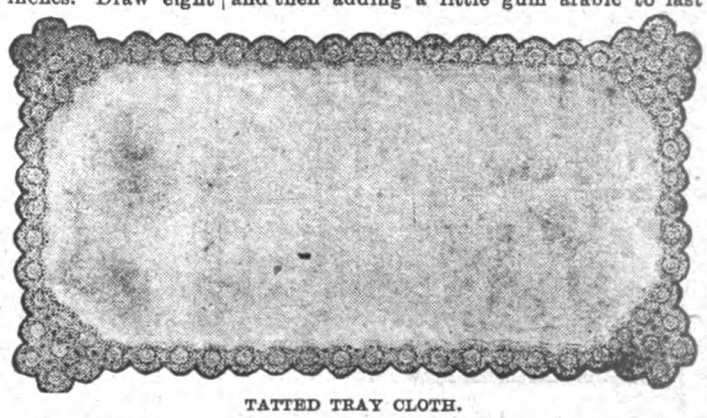
When making these flowers, first cover a tiny wad of cotton with a bit of satin and attach it to a piece of white hat wire. This forms the center of the rose. The petals are then added, working around and around, twisting the fine wire around the central stem.

After all the petals have been added cut five small three-cornered pieces of light-green silk for the calyx. Add these with the aid of fine wire. The calyx can be dispensed with if you wish; but without the calyx the flower does not look as natural as with it.

By closely bending and crumbling the satin you can get a very natural-looking flower.

Petals for a medium-sized rose should measure about two inches long and one inch wide, one edge being cut curved at the corners, gather on the square edge to the curved portion, then pull up tightly before fastening to wire.

Tatted Tray Cloth



BY ORA ARMSTRONG HILL.

Fig. 1 illustrates the wheel motif used in edging this tray cloth, while Fig. 2 gives one a clear idea of the corner arrangement of the motifs which make an unusual attractive edging.

WHEEL MOTIF. FIG. 1.

For the Tatted Wheel begin with ring of 12 picots with 1 d s between each, close ring, tie and cut thread. Now one ring of 6 d s, 7 p, 6 d s, close, leave quarter inch thread, one ring, 5 d s, join to first p of ring for center, 5 d s close, 1 ring of 6 d s, join to last picot of first large ring, 6 p, 6 d s close, small ring join 1 to second p of ring for center and repeat making in all 12 large rings, cut threads and tie. All the wheels are exactly alike and can be joined in making or afterwards as one prefers, after which arrange pattern on linen for center, baste in place and then permanently attach by buttonholing through the picots of the wheel which form the inner edge of the border.

TATTED TRAY CLOTH.

Baby's Dresses

It very often happens that baby's sheer little frocks are creased if put away in a drawer, even if great care be exercised in keeping them smooth. A much better plan is to procure a number of coathangers, children's size, and on these place the little dresses. Any particular dress is easily found and may be taken down without danger of crushing the others. It will be found worth while to have a circular bar put up in the closet, as a great many more frocks may be put away at a time.

Cleansing Laces

Fine laces which are much soiled should first be soaked in cold water to which add a little borax. Later put in a bottle of warm soapsuds and shake until clean, rinse in the same way and dry.

Black silk lace can be made to look like new by washing in soapy water, rinsing until clear, and then adding a little gum arabic to last rinsing water to give a little body to the lace. Squeeze out thoroughly and spread on a smooth surface. A marble-top table or window pane will answer nicely. No ironing will be necessary and unless the lace is worn it will look as good as new.

Old Stockings

No matter how often stockings are darned and how economically they are worn, there comes a day when they are no longer fit to appear in public. Then they begin to accumulate, until they are thrown out by the weary housewife.

They may be utilized, however, by slitting down the seams, or down the sides if they are of the seamless variety, and basting them down to make floor mops. The feet, of course, are cut off—they are usually the worst worn parts in any case. For a heavy floor mop, quilt several of the stockings loosely together after they are split, or for an ordinary dry mop use just one thickness of the cloth.

Another way of using the discarded hosiery is to make of it flatiron holders and stove cleaners to slip over the hand when applying the polish.

Driven Apart

"How can that forged notice which you put up in the various refugee camps help you?"

"It will lure the girl here, perhaps," said he; "and perhaps Preston himself will see one of the notices and come to this place. Then, if he loves the girl, and if he knows she is in my hands, he may be willing to trade the papers for the girl; or, if not, and he has the papers with him, the packet can be taken by force. Do you understand?"

"Yes," she replied, "I do understand, Nick; and I see that I have done wrong, because I misunderstood your motives. You never intended to marry this Beryl?"

"Never!"

"Forgive me, then," she begged, approaching him with her face transformed by the wealth of love she bore the consummate scoundrel. "Let me retrieve the injury I have done you by helping you accomplish your purpose. You will find me true and loyal——"

She was close to him by that time, and stretching out her arms for his embrace. This gave him his opportunity, the one for which he had been waiting. Like a hawk, he swooped upon the unsuspecting woman. His two arms shot out, his big, sinewy hands clasped about her white throat, and he bore her down to her knees. She gasped out a plea for mercy, but a fiendish glare was in his eyes.

"You would interfere with me, would you?" he hissed. "Well, it is for the last time! From now on you will not dog my steps, thwarting me at every turn, for I shall smother the last spark of life out of your body! I do love Beryl; she is more to me than you ever could be. If I could not win her as a maid, I shall possess her as a widow!"

This frightful treachery of Berdyne's aroused the tigress in Irma. She struggled with all the fury of her outraged heart, tearing at the hands that were slowly strangling her. To such good purpose did she resist that she was able to free her throat for an instant to give vent to a wild scream for help.

As the echoes rang out, they were taken up by a splintering crash as the front door fell in. A cry came from one of the rear rooms—it was Marm Kinney's voice:

"The cops! They are all around the house!"

With a horrible imprecation, Berdyne drew back his fist and struck the woman a blow, then bounded out of the room and up the stairs.

"Beryl!" cried the voice of Neil Preston, a moment later, as he ran into the room where Irma Lee, on her knees, was moaning and holding both hands to her temples.

CHAPTER XXXV.

A HOUSE OF MYSTERY.

On reaching Oakland, Neil, by the advice of Trenwyck, had secured some policemen and brought them to the J Street house. The lawyer, thoroughly dismayed by his chance meeting with Neil, and thinking the reckless Berdyne would halt at nothing in dealing with the young man, had succumbed to the dictates of his fears. He was an arrant coward; and while he dreaded the enmity of Berdyne, he dreaded more the enmity of the powerful Prestons in case any harm should happen to Neil.

The lawyer felt that Berdyne's case was hopeless. Trenwyck was to receive a large sum in case Berdyne could succeed in winning and marrying Beryl; but Neil had outmaneuvered Berdyne, and Beryl was now his bride. What more had Berdyne to hope for, unless he accomplished it by means so foul the lawyer dared have no part in them? Trenwyck, of course, was in the dark as to the papers Neil had secured from the wrecked trunk.

Neil, standing on Marm Kinney's doorstep, just ready to knock, heard the scream given by Irma Lee. He thought it was Beryl, and in a second had broken down the door and flung himself into the hall. By this time Berdyne was up the stairs and out of sight. Neil dashed through the nearest door, which, as we have already seen, led to the room in which Irma Lee had suffered such inhuman treatment.

"Miss Lee!" he cried. "What has happened?"

He lifted the palid woman to her feet and saw the great bruise on her forehead.

"Who has done this?" Neil cried. "Speak!"

"Let it pass," answered Irma Lee, her eyes narrowing with deadly hate. She panted gaspingly, and dropped backward against the wall.

"Is my darling in this house?" asked Neil.

"I do not know," whispered Irma. "Berdyne is here—he has just fled up the stairs. Follow him!"

With a fierce cry, Neil whirled about and dashed out of the room and up the stairs. Irma, recovering herself with a fierce effort, started to follow. As she crossed the floor she saw a revolver lying on the bare boards; it was the weapon Berdyne had drawn in the hall, and had fallen from his pocket.

The revolver was a small one. She gazed at it for an instant, then stooped, picked it up, and thrust it into her bosom. A serpentlike smile wreathed about her thin, pale lips.

"He struck me!" she whispered; "he struck me! He would have killed me had not Neil Preston come!"

She went on up the stairs. At the top of the landing she was met by Neil.

"There is no one up here!" he cried distractedly. "You are sure Berdyne came this way?"

"I know it," she answered. "He must be here."

"But I am sure there is no one here. The house is surrounded by policemen, however, and esape from it is impossible. If Berdyne is hiding, we shall get him out!"

Neil ran down the stairs again. A captain of police had accompanied him, in charge of the detail. The captain was standing in the hall below.

"Who was it gave that scream?" asked the captain. "Was it the woman you are trying to find?"

"No—another one," answered Neil. "Berdyne was attempting to murder her, I believe; she says he fled up the stairs when I broke down the door; but he is not up there—no one is up there."

"Does the woman know whether your wife is in this building?"

"No. However, Berdyne is here; we must run the treacherous scoundrel to earth, captain."

"We will do what we can, of course," was the reply, "but this is one of the worst holes on this side of the bay. Many a time we have tracked a criminal here, and have had him vanish under our very eyes. It is a house of mystery, Mr. Preston. The first thing to do, if possible, is to get our hands on Marm Kinney, the old hag who runs it."

With this object in view, they searched thoroughly the whole lower part of the house. There were evidences of occupancy below as well as above, yet not a soul was to be seen. Every one in that ill-omened place had disappeared, even with a cordon of officers drawn about the outer walls.

"It looks as though we have been fooled," muttered the captain. "It is a pity the earthquake didn't tumble this old shack down about Marm Kinney's ears!"

"Look, look thoroughly!" cried Neil. "I am confident that that black-hearted scoundrel is around somewhere, and he must be arrested and brought to justice."

The captain went one way and Neil another, both continuing the search and recognizing the necessity of doing it thoroughly. The captain went to the rear part of the structure, and Neil to the front. The latter was just entering the room where he had found Irma Lee, when her voice floated down to him from upstairs!

"Come here quick, Mr. Preston!"

He returned hurriedly to the second floor. Irma was in the front room where Beryl had been confined. The room was in some confusion, and Irma stood in the center, pointing to one of the walls.

"Look!" she exclaimed.

What Neil beheld was the corner of a gray shawl thrust, as it seemed, out of the solid plaster. Hastening forward, he caught the corner of the shawl and pulled at it. A panel yielded under the pressure, opening slightly and showing a black void beyond.

"A secret door!" cried Neil. "But this shawl—is it Marm Kinney's?"

"It was Beryl's," returned Irma.

"Beryl's?" gasped Neil. "No, no!" he exclaimed. "She had no shawl of this kind."

"You are mistaken, Mr. Preston. I have seen her since you have, and when we were last together she had a shawl like that. She has been carried through that secret door by Berdyne. In his haste, Berdyne did not notice that the shawl caught in the closing panel and was left behind."

A furious cry escaped Neil. If Irma spoke truly—and he had no reason to doubt her—Beryl had been a prisoner in that room, and Berdyne had fled with her. He hurriedly opened the panel wide, and stood looking down into the murky depths. As his eyes became somewhat familiar with the gloom, he could see a flight of narrow stairs leading downward. Ah, here was one clew to the mysteries of that house of crime!

As he was on the point of dashing down the steps, something flashed up out of the blackness, glittering in its flight. There followed a sharp impact, and Neil saw a knife quivering in the woodwork at his side.

"Be careful!" warned Irma. "You are among those who are eager for your life, Mr. Preston."

"I care not how many dangers confront me!" he answered, in ringing tones. "My darling wife is somewhere in those murky depths, and I will find her and rescue her."

A moment later and he was swallowed up in the blackness. Irma Lee followed him, the panel closing behind her and throwing the secret staircase entirely into the gloom.

"Aye," she muttered to herself, "you are eager to find your wife, and I—I am equally desirous of once more meeting Berdyne!"

from dainty stockings, caps for fall, warm quilt linings—that won't slip off the bed—baby jackets, wristlets, play mittens, stove holders and smaller stockings with seam up the back.

Flour sacks, bleached, are good for pillow slips, dish towels, sash curtains, breakfast cloths and underwear. Dye 'em and see what pretty things may be made. Stand covers, shelf cloths, pillow slips, quilt linings, dresses, aprons, caps and couch covers. There are many pretty dyes to be had and it is interesting to use them in different ways. I made a cupboard of boxes and curtained it with flour sacks and it looks real neat. I always feather stitch the hems.

So many of you have asked me how to decorate a living-room for summer. As you know, I am a lover of Nature and her colors and my tastes are very simple—like my brain.

Dark-shadowy-green ceiling; warm tan walls; dark brown woodwork and floor with not more than three easy-to-shake moss-green rugs scattered about. There would be no tiresome dust catchers and not much furniture, just a camp cot, porch table and a few comfortable chairs, a large Boston fern, green shades with draped back sash curtains, several magazines, sewing basket, writing material, footstool and a bird. Perhaps gold fish or a cage of squirrels would do as well but I'd want something alive. I believe after all I'd have to turn the squirrel loose so the fish would be much better. Of course the cot would have a spread and heaps of washable sofa pillows and there'd be a large floor pillow tossed in the lonesomest corner, for if things didn't appear careless my nest would be a room instead of a dream corner. Yep—I sit and dream when I sew. Don't you?

To make a beautiful footstool, bolt four old stove legs to a block sawed from a log. Paint the legs with auto or radiator paint. Pad the top with circles cut from an old quilt, cover with plush, velvet or piece tacks.

Before I go I wish to make an earnest appeal to each of you to do the share of the work which God calculated for you to do, and do it with a smile.

Some kinds of business would thrive on the eight-hour-day plan but farming cannot. Do not urge it for farm hands—the very people who raise the foods you need—will flock to those short-hour places and instead of the horrid letters H. C. O. L. we'll get what Daddy calls "h!"

I know how hard it is to live on the present wages, for Mr. V. has supported his little crowd on less than a thousand a year, right along; working ten hours a day and usually several hours more mornings and evenings. The things we cannot get we go without; living in hopes and happiness, knowing that these are unusual times. Let us all be patient until the roads get good again. Cut down, make over, do without and don't be ashamed of the patches. Make Hubby understand that you are contented, whether you are or not. If wages get higher the men who pay them will raise prices as well. We do not need so many play hours as people are calling for. Rather—find work that you like and make your job a part of your recreation. I find that my busiest days fly the quickest and so take up my mind that I have no time in which to get discontented. I often work fifteen hours a day and then often find time to read or write an hour and I am the happiest person I know of and I've known me for years. I am not disgusted with the wealthy class; I'd even be willing to belong to their set and perhaps, too, I'd be a wicked profiteer. The people of wealth are just as discontented as the rest of our big family. It's in the air and in trying to make both end meet there will be no use trying to mimic a "purp" that is chasing his own tail.

Were I to answer personally all who ask my advice about getting along with their husbands, it would cost me ten dollars a month for postage alone. You wouldn't hitch two colts to a load and expect 'em to walk off with it, now would you? Daddy and I fought like wild mustangs the first year we were double harnessed; but we were blessed with sound reasoning power—as I am sure you are—and we just kept tugging until we learned to pull together. Of course, domestic troubles are much heavier than loads of coal and grain; and, too, harness or wagon may break—there's bound to be accidents—but the team isn't to blame for that and as God holds the reins nothing serious can happen if you keep quiet and make a new start at the right time.

Oh, Girls, there is "strength" in just keeping quiet at times. Try it and see. Mind you though, you'll have to keep your own tugs taut, and piling the load on John's side of the wagon will not lighten your load.

I am not taking part with the husbands. They are all regular old—old—er—humans, the same as we are.

Sincerely, PEARL FRANCES VESEY.

In addition to Pearl's advice about "keeping quiet," a well-developed sense of humor, it can't be too strong, is one of the best First Aids to Matrimony.—Ed.

The first and main thing is to build up the entire nerve system. Eat nourishing foods and keep free from colds in the head. The nerves cause many cases of deafness as they press on neck cords and nerves leading to ears.

The following herbs will be found a splendid nerve builder and strengthener, a true simple cure right from nature and one that many physicians indorse as being not of the deadly drug order but something that soothes, quiets and builds in nature's way. They also cured me of a nervous breakdown and I have since seen many like cures. I will use a common tea cup as a measure. Place one cup each of blue skullcap and nerve root into a glass fruit jar or some tight can, add one fourth cup of mint blossoms, shake all well, then place one teaspoon of the mixed herbs in a cup, fill with boiling water, cover and set aside till cold. Strain. Dose: one third cup three times a day or it can be taken in mouthful doses during the day. More can be taken where nerves are very bad, say extra half cup on retiring or more in extreme cases of hysteria. The herbs should be as fresh as possible. Now with our nerves cared for we'll treat the ear direct. Purchase some fresh olive oil and nightly heat it until quite warm and then with head back and over to one side treat the deafest ear first by pouring enough oil into it till it can be felt back into the head. Pull the lobe of the ear up and down and out from the head to help oil run in. After a few minutes, treat other ear in same manner. Have ready some rather large piece of medicated batting to insert into ears to keep oil in and of sufficient size to prevent working far into the ear at night. Rub neck cords, back of ears, back of head, well up into hair; also throat, spine and chest with warm camphorated oil, then hie to bed, relax and be sure to keep feet warm even if a hot flatiron is used, for cold feet will put nerves in tension.

Mrs. Hope Lane, try gently massaging eyes, temples, forehead and nostrils nightly with warm olive oil and see if your eyes are not benefited. Do this just before retiring. Also have spine and back of neck well rubbed with camphorated oil, well warmed. Olive oil is a great food and penetrator and has helped me in many ways. Plain olive oil, warmed and massaged into the abdomen night and morning has cured many severe constipation cases. My stomach refuses to retain it but it has done me much service by feeding it from outside through the skin.

Pearl Vesey, I greatly admire your letters. Give us more like them. There are many who need to look on the good and bright side of life; it's the only on which to travel.

Sincerely, MRS. MAGDALEN CLARK.

ALABAMA.

HELLO EVERYBODY:

I feel mighty shaky but if I tap loud enough and bring my mite for Uncle Charlie's Home Fund I think maybe you will let me in, and now that I am in I want to sit by Contrary Mary. I am one of the bachelor girls too.

I am "just an old maid," but as I am a housekeeper and Mrs. Wilkinson asked the sisters to tell what they had done to make the home attractive I will tell you what I did to our porch. The house is small so I made a living-room of it by boarding it up two and one half feet from the floor and then screening it. I have a hammock at either end, made of striped canvas. They are not hard to make and are better than the real cheap ones you buy and cheaper than the real good ones are. I had some Japanese grass rugs so used them and on one side of the door, leading into the house, I built a writing desk against the wall, covering it with cretonne. I do all my writing there in the summer-time. On the other side of the door I have some shelves where books and maga-

Selecting Hens for Next Winter's Eggs

AS I told you last month, culling is the important work just at this season, for, with the present price of feed, no one can afford to keep "deadheads."

The indications that a bird is physically qualified to produce eggs are: A clear, full bright eye, the eyelids wide open and not sluggish; a good pair of shanks, with straight, well-worn toenails showing constant use in scratching. Only a healthy fowl is a laying fowl, and such a bird must of necessity have a good appetite. A hen that is laying has an enlarged abdomen, due to the enlarged intestines, ovary and oviduct, and the body is deeper at the rear than at the front of the keel. These points are not so well marked when the hen ceases laying.

In the non-laying hen there is likely to be an unusual accumulation of fat in the abdomen and under the skin of the body, so that a plump appearance presents itself; the fat under the skin of the shanks, especially in the back, causes that part of the leg to have a round appearance. When this hen is in her laying period, the surplus fat to a certain extent is used, and the shanks lose their round, plump appearance, and the same is true of other parts of the body, especially in the region of the pelvis and vent. The face appearing more plump and fat, thins out, and the skin of the face, comb, earlobes, wattles, and also over the body, becomes more soft and pliable as the hen passes from a non-laying period to a laying period. These changes in the comb, earlobes and wattles are sex characteristics, and become changed as just stated, as the ovary and oviduct become enlarged and active. When the hen passes from a laying to a non-laying state, the ovary and oviduct shrink, and the comb, wattles and earlobes lose their soft, pliable and red appearance, becoming more dull in color, and the comb looks as if it had been powdered.

The pelvic bones are wide apart in the heavy producer, but contract again when she ceases to lay. The fullness of abdomen and width of the pelvic arch will depend on how heavily the hen will lay during the next two or three weeks. At the same time the pelvic arch enlarges, the abdomen also enlarges and the vent grows larger and flabbier. A heavy laying hen has a soft skin all over the body. The non-laying hen has a hard, plump body, with bones not too evident. A pinched body indicates a small capacity and a poor producer. The meat type of bird has a tendency to turn her feed into fat, which is indicated by the thick pelvic arch and a hard abdomen. In the laying hen the ischial bones of the pelvic arch are thin. In the heavy laying hen there is noted bleached shanks, beak, earlobes, eyelids and vent.

FEEDING THE CHICKENS.

The yellow color is due to xanthophyll, which occurs principally in the green feed; thus, the more green feed the bird consumes, the slower will be the bleaching of the parts when the laying period begins. In the heavy laying hen the capacity will be indicated by the distance from the posterior point of the breastbone to the pelvic arch, which should be three or four fingers' breadth, and the pubic bones in the region of the vent should be two or three fingers in breadth. In the non-layer these pubic bones may be scarcely one finger's breadth apart.

And when on the job of culling, don't forget that there are many advantages in the capon over the ordinary roasting fowl. He is much larger, attains weight more cheaply, is always in demand because of a large carcass, and sells for from ten to twelve cents a pound higher than the rooster because of the quality of the meat.

After cockerels have reached the age of four and a half or five months they become quarrelsome, and are hard to keep in flocks of more than four or five, whereas capons can be kept in large flocks, and are as docile as a flock of pullets. Being inactive, they put on weight rapidly, and, although their bodies reach an enormous size, they never become tough.

It is not advisable to caponize the lighter breeds, such as the Leghorns, etc., as the large carcass can never be obtained from such fowls. The American type, such as the Plymouth Rock, Rhode Island Red and Wyandotte, and the Asiatic type, such as the Brahma and Langshan, are breeds which may be caponized profitably.

Everybody who keeps hens, no matter how few or how many, should give the subject of housing and feeding during the winter special consideration, for birds should be placed in their permanent quarters, given regular egg-producing rations, and started before the end of the month. Upheavals, such as change of houses, or methods of feeding, upset the birds and check the egg-laying machinery, and as the winter schedule should not be changed after it is once started, do what needs doing to the houses, how many birds you are going to keep through the winter, what feed stuffs and litter you will use, must all be well considered and decided without delay.

First comes the house. No matter how plain or shabby it may be, it can be made stormproof, clean and well ventilated without much expense. Stop up all the cracks and holes, and cover the roof and sides with tar paper. Clean the walls and all the inside fixtures, then give them a coat of thick whitewash, being careful to get it into all the cracks and crevices, for those are the places where vermin congregate.

The floor of the house where you keep the birds must also come in for its share of cleaning. If it is just a dirt floor, scrape it off two or three inches deep, and cart in the same amount of strong clay soil that will pound down to a hard clay surface. If the floor is of boards, swab it off with plenty of hot, soapy water, using a good hard broom. Let it dry thoroughly, and before the birds are put into the house, cover at least six inches deep with litter. The best way to be sure of ventilating the ordinary chicken-house is to take out the sash in half the windows at opposite ends of the house, and cover the openings with strong unbleached muslin.

I like to have one or two glass windows on the south or southwest side of the house, as they allow the direct rays of the sun to get in and the birds enjoy it in cold weather. It is well to have a frame door covered with muslin, as well as the wooden door, as the muslin will let in some air and light, and should keep out snow during the stormy days when the birds will have to be kept in the house.

The matter of litter for the floor is almost as important as the selection of food stuffs. Many people think that any old hay or straw will do for hens to scratch in, but it won't. Musty, moldy or old hay causes more sickness among fowls than anything else, as it breeds several different kinds of spores and germs, which float in the air when the hens dig up the material, and are inhaled by the birds, and rapidly develop diseases of the lungs and intestines, and one special germ even affects the eggs laid by the hens, causing white diarrhea in chicks hatched by them. So you see how important it is to have clean litter and nesting material. We use shavings and chopped corn-stalks topped with dried leaves as long as we have them. We gather all we can in the fall and store them in boxes. Several years ago, we tried shavings only, and had many cases of crop-bound hens, but have had no trouble since we used the combination of corn-stalks or straw. The shavings are particularly valuable, because they are cheap, and prevent the other material from packing down, and so insure a circulation of air through the litter, which keeps it sweet.

The next important matter to decide is the amount of pullets and year-old hens that you can keep through the winter. Don't overcrowd your house. There is nothing more detrimental to egg production or strong chicks in the spring as overcrowding stock in the winter. Twenty well-cared-for hens, with plenty of house room, will produce more eggs and better birds next spring than fifty which are crowded. Besides which, if a lot of hens are crowded into small quarters in the night, their breath and the moisture of their bodies is more than the air can carry off, and it rises to the roof, where it freezes during the night and melts during the heat of the midday sun, so causing a perpetual recurrence of moisture day after day, which soon makes the house damp and unhealthy. Plenty of cold fresh air perpetually circulating through the house keeps it fresh and dry, and is beneficial to the birds.

Having arranged the house and the number of birds to be kept, general care and feeding is the next thing to consider. The breed of chickens you keep, the part of the country in which you are located, must influence that to a great extent. In sections of the country where the weather is extremely cold, hens require rations rich in fats and oils to keep them warm. On the other hand, in the Southern States they require only enough fat-forming foods to nourish their bodies and produce eggs.

Hens must have a variety of food to produce eggs in winter. The best way to convince you of the fact is to give you a chemical analysis of the egg, which is: Water, 650 grains; albuminoids, 80 grains; oil, fats, etc., 135 grains; mineral matter, 9 grains; sugar, coloring matter, etc., 26 grains. The remaining hundred parts of the thousand of an egg are used in the shell, which contains about 59 grains of salts and lime and 50 grains of pure, uncombined lime, the remainder being carbolic acid water of crystallization. Albuminoids are the flesh-forming parts of food, often called nitrogens.

Oils and fats come under the heads of carbons. Mineral matter consists of lime, soda, potash, magnesia and sulphur. Knowing the materials necessary for the egg, no one ought to be foolish enough to expect a biddy to produce eggs unless she is provided with the necessary materials. Farmers complain that hens lay nearly all their eggs in the spring, when they are hardly worth the trouble of marketing, and stop as soon as the prices go up in the winter. And it is true of most farms, simply because in the spring the hens can find all the elements necessary for the formation of the egg, but after frost destroys green grass, clover and insects, they stop producing because they have no materials from which to make the egg.

Now, however, I hope to convince you of the common-sense advantage of balanced rations. The next consideration is what ordinary farm products are best and cheapest to feed biddy on during the winter. Clover, alfalfa (green or hay), linseed meal or wheat bran, all contain about six pounds of lime in every hundred. Turnip tops, beets and carrots also contain a goodly amount, hence their great value in making up rations for laying hens. Clover hay, linseed meal and wheat bran are also flesh-forming foods, like middlings or skimmed milk. Oils and fats we get principally from corn and buckwheat, and the lesser amount from wheat, rye, clover hay, linseed meal and unskimmed milk.

Minerals are principally furnished by the process of digestion, which reduces to ash the grains and herbage, which contain lime, potash, magnesia and sulphur. One quart of mixed grains is as follows:

Two parts of coarsely cracked corn, two parts of wheat, one part oats, buckwheat or barley. One part of this mixture, scattered in deep litter, for twenty hens in the morning. At noon, a mash made as follows: Mix two parts of wheat bran, and one each of white middlings and corn-meal, one half part each of gluten feed and meat scraps. Alfalfa or clover hay we must have as it gives depth of color to the yolk of the egg, and the necessary black to the rations; so to make the mash, put four quarts of alfalfa or clover hay which has been chopped fine, into a can with a tight lid. Pour upon it just enough scalding hot water to thoroughly moisten it. Cover, and allow it to stand three or four hours, then add one quart of the ground corn mixture. Feed about one pint to every ten hens the first morning. If they eat that up clean in less than ten minutes, increase the quantity slightly, but be very careful to give only what they will eat up clean in fifteen minutes.

The mash must only be steamed enough to crumble, never pasty and wet. About one hour before dark, feed the same as in the morning, except that an extra half-pint may be added to the quantity, and when the weather is cold, whole corn should be used instead of cracked corn. Sharp grit and oyster shell must be before them all the time, and unless you have drinking fountains which will not freeze, the dishes should be emptied and refilled with warm water morning, noon and night. Change the litter on the floor of the house every two or three weeks and shake it up every day. Follow these directions and you should have plenty of eggs from October until June.

M. M. G.—As the chicks hatched under hens had the same abnormal condition, the fault must have been with the hens and not with the incubator. The breeding stock from which the eggs came must either have been inbred, or very seriously out of condition, but I can't say definitely what the trouble was without knowing more about the parent birds, their age, family history, general health during the past year, and how fed and handled. Of course, nothing can be done for chicks hatched in such a condition. The only thing is to prevent the repetition of the trouble, by correcting whatever may have been wrong with your breeding stock.

W. R.—You will get better results from using boric acid wash instead of grease. Half a teaspoonful of boric acid to half a tumbler of water.

J. A. R.—Hatches vary considerably, according to the season of the year. If very early, the percentage is much lower than it is in March or April, and again in June and July it runs down. Two hundred and forty-four chicks from 312 eggs was a very good hatch, especially for an amateur. The crop trouble was possibly caused by indigestion. Do you keep grit and charcoal before the birds all the time?

zines are kept. I have the tops of these covered with cretonne to match desk. I keep flowers on a small table, whenever I have them. It is comfortable and cool and may be used as a sleeping porch as well as a living-room.

Mrs. Lane asked the sisters to tell how they earned money. I do some fancy work for my neighbors and make some money that way but I am not so good at that so I earn most of my money by making candy. Whenever any of the neighbors want candy for something special I make it for them. I find this an easy way as I don't mind making candy and my friends are always willing to let me make it for them.

Can any of the sisters suggest a way to get rid of ants? They are mighty bad here in the summer.

I think I see Mrs. Wilkinson frowning now so I will leave and let some other sister (or brother) have a chance.

Love to all, MEG.

Meg.—If I frowned it was because you didn't tell us how to make your delicious candy—for it is delicious I am sure, and we'd like to have your recipes. It is much better for a person to do work they like to do and can do well and easily, than to attempt something they don't know much about, just because someone else does it. Your living-room porch must be a very attractive and comfy place.—Ed.

CHIMACUM, WASH.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS AND EDITOR:

It seems good to once more enjoy a chat with all of you. Since my last visit I have heard from quite a number and if you did not all receive an answer please pick it out of this letter.

So many letters were sent me by people who want to know about the climate here and most of them seem to think it is the same as California. There is not room in this column for much of an article on the subject but I will say a few words in answer to the many queries from COMFORT readers. California has a warm climate where grow the citrus fruits. Oregon and western Washington have temperate climates with a heavy rainfall, very little snow, evergreen forests and beautiful sheets of inland waters. East of the Cascade Mountains, which divide the state, the climate is dry, with extremes of heat and cold, and very productive and mostly under irrigation.

To the sister who wrote me from New Mexico, asking, "Are there any schools or churches there?" I say that the state of Washington ranks high in education, there being many large institutions of learning in different parts of the state and I wish I were able to describe to you the school building in the district where I live, a one-story concrete building, with steam heat, electric lights, telephone, piano, stage with wings, footlights, etc., and a large auditorium fitted with a first-class motion picture outfit. This structure was built in 1916 at a cost of about twenty-six thousand dollars. Both the graded school and the high school are maintained in the same building. All this in a country place, fifty miles from the city.

There is no land here now for homesteading. It may interest some of you to know that Seattle is just fifty years old, has a population of 400,000 and has three hundred churches, sixty-nine graded schools besides the high schools and university.

With best wishes to all, MRS. MAGGIE ROBINSON.

IOWA.

DEAR SISTERS:

This bright morning the cardinal, robin and innumerable other birds whose songs I do not recognize are making music which cannot be excelled. All nature seems to be rejoicing and through my mind keeps fitting these words of Browning's:

"God's in His heaven—

And they seem so true for isn't this world just the most beautiful place in which to live? What a privilege to be a part of it and how wonderful to live among such beauties of nature as surround us! But I want to talk to you sisters about keeping young.

If I could direct you to a fountain of youth no doubt you would all sit up and take notice. But I want to give you a few suggestions that, I believe, will detract years from your age. I am trying these out and thought others might want to give them a trial.

Everyone needs exercise and we who are doing housework get an abundance of it for there is scarcely a muscle which is not exercised some time during each day. This is beneficial if we make pleasure out of our work; on the other hand, if it is drudgery to us we lose so much. Really, I know of no work more pleasant than housework if done in a systematic way. I enjoy it immensely but I work only what I think is healthy

Making Clover Hay

CLOVER hay is particularly hard to cure. First, because it is ready for cutting before the rainy season is fairly over, and second because the plant contains so much water and the stems are so large that it take a long time to dry. Many farmers seek to avoid these difficulties by letting the clover get nearly ripe before cutting. Mature, or nearly ripe clover, is partially dried out and hence cures much more easily. But ripe clover makes poor hay. There are two or three good methods for making clover hay which permit it to be cut at the proper time. The right time to cut clover hay is when the plants are in full blossom and before any of the heads have turned brown.

The Use of Caps

Many farmers cure clover and alfalfa under caps. The hay is cut, allowed to wilt and then immediately "cocked up." Over the top of the cock is spread a canvas cap. This cap is held in place by fastening an old horseshoe to each of its four corners—or by the use of cement weights made for that purpose. Often a heavy wire is bent in the form of a hook and fastened to the corners of the cap, the hook being pulled down and hooked into the hay near the bottom of the cock. The cocks are allowed to stand in the field for a week or more—when the caps are removed—the cock turned over and dried in the sun for a few hours on the day of hauling.

Curing without Caps

Other farmers cut their clover after the dew is off and cock it up at once in small cocks. This green clover settles down and sheds rain pretty well without the use of caps. The clover in the cocks goes through the "sweat" and rids itself of most of its moisture in two or three days. Then on the morning of a bright day when the clover is to be put in the mow in the afternoon, the cocks are turned over and spread out. This is done after the dew is off and the hay is allowed to dry in the sun for several hours.

Clover does not need to be bone dry. If it is, the leaves will fall off, but it must be dry enough so that it will not heat or mold in the mow.

Using the Side Delivery Rake

Another good way to cure clover is by the use of the side delivery rake. After the clover is cut and dry on top it is immediately raked into windrows by the use of the side delivery rake. The hay cures in the row for a day or so and then the row is turned over by driving the rake over the row—when it is allowed to cure for another spell. After one or two turnings in the row the hay is dry enough to be put into the mow.

Clover Hay Silage

Sometimes the weather is so bad that the clover hay can't be cured. Right here the silo comes in handy. The clover is cut and hauled dripping wet to the silo. It is then run through the cutter and cut into lengths one to two inches long and tramped down in the silo. This thoroughly wet clover hay makes the best of silage and is particularly fine for summer feeding when the pastures get short.

Let the Pigs Feed Themselves

Give the pig a chance and he will make a hog of himself. The self-feeder gives him this chance. During the past few years hog feeding, particuly the growing of young pigs, has undergone complete change. Experiment stations have shown that the old method of growing pigs in a dry lot and hand feeding them is a very poor method indeed.

Pigs Must Have Pasture

In the first place, pigs do best on some kind of green feed,—good growing blue grass pasture is splendid. This gives them range and needed exercise and the growing cells of the grass contain exactly what the pig needs for his own growth.

Lacking good blue grass pasture, other kinds of pasture should be provided. Oats and peas mixed, a bushel and a half each of seed per acre, make good summer pasture, and oats, peas and rape mixed are good the season through. Clover and alfalfa are also the finest kind of summer pasture for pigs.

Self-Feeders Necessary

For pigs on pasture, self-feeders are necessary if grain or other concentrated food is fed and some form of concentrates is always needed. Corn, to be fed in a self-feeder, must be shelled or ground. Young pigs need much protein. If skim-milk is not fed then tankage should be used. Tankage should be fed in the self-feeder and the pig allowed to help himself. The feeders should be watched to see that they do not become clogged and the feed supply cut off as a result.

How to Use the Self-Feeder

The one-compartment self-feeder is as good as any. If two or more kinds of feed are to be fed they should be mixed by hand in the proper proportions and then dumped together into the feeder. It used to be argued that the pigs would balance their own ration but we know now that it is better to mix the feeds for them. If we do, then only one compartment to the self-feeder is necessary. The feeder may be placed in the open lot if it has a good water-tight roof on it. The open box type of self-feeder should, of course, be kept under cover.

Keep Feeder in Colony House

The best place to keep pigs on pasture is in little colony houses, a litter to the house. In these colony houses the self-feeders should be placed so that the pigs can run to them in all kinds of weather. The careful farmer will make a trip around to the colony houses every day to see that the feeders have enough feed in them and that all are working well.

See the Farm as Others See It

The average city man takes a great deal of pride in the looks of his home. He knows that it is under constant inspection, and strives to the best of his financial ability to make it attractive. He keeps his house in good repair, well painted and spends time on the lawn and shrubbery so his home will measure up well with his neighbors.

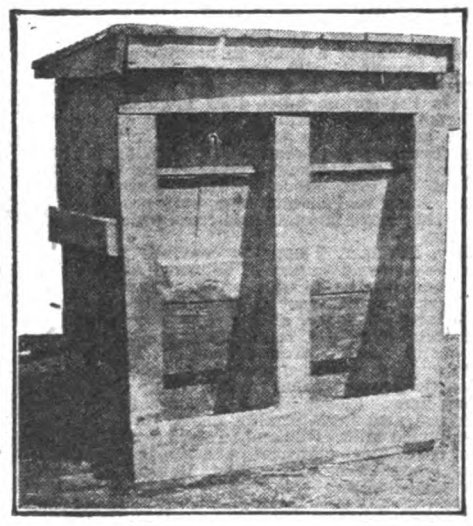
Again, there is always a neighborhood pride, and he wants to be counted a desirable resident of his particular part of the city. Let a house or lot be neglected in a well-built section of a town and it follows that the family owning the property are soon made to feel that they are not wanted in that particular neighborhood and are counted out of the community interests.

What the Automobile Did

There was a time when the farmer was prone to neglect the appearance of his home and buildings, feeling that there were few who saw them anyway. Now, with the coming of the automobile and the constant travel on all passable roads, his home is under almost as much inspection as if he lived in the city.

Go out with an automobile party for a day's ride and listen to their comment. The majority of people are not out for the "joy-riding." They are out to enjoy what they can see on either side of the road, and many are the remarks about it. Attention is called to an attractive house, a well-built barn, compact outbuildings, the yard, the trees and the flowers surrounding them. Eagerly the name of the farm and its owner is read, and we have often noticed that the well-built, attractive farm home has a name painted on one of the buildings.

The farmer should put himself in the place of the passer-by and try to forget that he owns his property, and should look at it through the stranger's eyes.



Who Lives Here?

A house is the index of the people who live within and is the keynote to the whole improvement scheme—so we will begin with that. The sagging porch—the broken shingles—the ragged lattice—the old screens—the loosened boards, all need to be put in shipshape before the painter can commence his job—no farmer in these days of the high cost of lumber can afford to leave any wooden building that is worth letting stand, suffer for a lack of paint. Paint does wonders besides preserving the wood; it makes an old house look like new, and gives it a "spick and span" appearance that makes its owner feel he is not ashamed of living in it.

Make the Outbuildings Attractive

Then how out of place a newly painted house looks set in the midst of a shabby barn—an unpainted milk-house and an old tumbled-down shed. He needs take every building on the place—give it a thorough going over—fix it up—paint it—and have the farm look as if someone lived there.

Sometimes a lot of old buildings, of little or no use, are allowed to stand and litter up, and spoil the looks of an otherwise fine looking farm. These should all be torn down,—many times good lumber can be salvaged out of them which can be used for other farm buildings.

A TWO-COMPARTMENT SELF-FEEDER.

After he has done his best with the buildings, it is well to study the permanent location of the fences, hog yard, barn yard, etc. These should be well set back from the road and toward the rear of the house.

Of course, if he has bought his farm with the buildings on it, there may be little to do as to changing their location, but he can keep the hog-pen out of the road or from in front of the house and he can move his chicken yard back, keep the ducks and geese from running all over the lawn and straighten up and repair the fences.

Keep Premises Clean

So many farms have litter and rubbish scattered all over the premises. The farmer should have his spring farm cleaning just as regularly as his good wife has hers in the house. During the winter there is an immense amount of leaves, broken limbs, dead vegetation from the year before, old sticks, stones and what not, which come from everywhere and give the farm a dirty and untidy appearance. The ash pile with its tin cans, bones old Rover has forgotten to bury, and seemingly everything under the sun is lying around the yard and spoiling its looks.

The passerby naturally thinks when he sees such a yard that some mighty dirty people live there and wishes they would clean up. Maybe he is right, it may be dirty people do live there, but generally it is the result of the farmer not taking stock of his home, and carelessly allowing such a condition to exist.

Make Place Attractive

After the farmer has repaired and painted his buildings, cleaned up old rubbish, fixed the fences, and has done all he can to improve the looks of his farm, now comes the very interesting part of the whole improvement scheme—decoration.

Probably there are already some nice shade trees around the house,—if he has these, the rest comes easy. There are many hardy ornamental shrubs that are old-time favorites, and so many lovely perennial flowers that there is no end to the beauty he can add to his yard.

Then, after it is all done, what a wonderful satisfaction it is to know he owns it all and that he and his are responsible for its comfort and its beauty. He may well be proud to have the passerby notice his home and comment favorably upon it. Not only can he enjoy it himself, but the passerby enjoys it too, and his neighbors come in for their share. There is a deep satisfaction to be known as the man who owns the fine looking farm.

Farm Buildings

Sometimes the farmer when planning his buildings is perplexed to know just what kind of a barn, a hog-house, a corn-crib, a granary or poultry house to build. He wants every dollar he invests to give him the most economical construction and the greatest convenience for the money expended. He may not have seen many strictly modern, up-to-date farm buildings and he does not know what he may have when he builds.

For such a farmer the thing to do is to carefully think out every problem he may be called upon to solve in his particular kind of farming and then build accordingly.

Size of Buildings

Many farmers make the great mistake of building for the present. They have no vision and do not look ahead to the probable development of their farm and its necessary needs in the future.

The farmer knowing the size of his farm can easily figure on the amount of produce it can be made to yield and the livestock it can carry. Knowing this, he should build—not for what he can and will produce when his plant is operating at its greatest capacity. It is a mighty short-sighted farmer who thinks he may build "on" as his farm progresses—nothing "built on" is as satisfactory unless there is provision made for it in the general plan.

Build for Equipment

So many times after the farmer has built he sees some new convenience or some labor-saving device installed in someone's else barn or hog-house that he might just as well have had if he had only thought of it while his building was under construction. Probably it might have cost him little, if any extra, and only because of lack of careful planning he is deprived of it. For example, in a dairy barn, which needs a particular equipment, he must think if he can have a modern dairy stall, a cement manger and gutter, an overhead cleaning seplim, individual drinking cups and all other dairy conveniences which are of necessity on a successful dairy farm.

Country Carpenter

Many times the farmer depends on the carpenter hired to help him solve the kind of a building he should build. The ordinary carpenter has not made a study of farm problems, maybe he has never helped construct an up-to-date, modern barn or farm buildings, and although he may be able to follow plans and give good satisfaction in the construction part, yet no one should expect him to do the thinking and provide for the future installing of labor-saving devices, or the planning of a plan for modern equipment. This must be done by the farmer himself with all the help he can possibly get. The government and state through its bulletins, the state through its experts at the Agricultural College, the County Agent, if his county is fortunate to have one, the firm he buys his lumber of, the many houses which handle farm building equipment,—and all will be glad to furnish him with accurate and helpful data if he will only let them know his needs—and all to be had for the asking. Then, if it is possible, he should visit some modern, up-to-date farm which has the kind of a building he wants and he can see for himself the advantage of a convenient farm building with a place for the installation of modern farm equipment. It is not a question of whether he can have it when he builds, maybe at this time he cannot afford it, but the farmer must have just as much vision, and just as much faith in his financial future, as any other business man or success will be slow in coming.

Questions and Answers

SNAILS AND CABBAGE WORMS.—My garden is so full of snails that it is almost impossible to grow anything. What can we do to get rid of them? What do you prescribe for cabbage worms? J. G., Oil City, Pa.

A.—The best remedy for snails is air-slacked lime powdered to a fine dust and blown over the plants or on the ground over which the snails crawl. Too much lime will kill plants, hence great care must be exercised by its use. Bordeaux mixture is effective. Keep garden clean and free from rubbish, weeds, and old boards under which snails hide. Hand pick and destroy. To destroy cabbage worms, use strong salt brine or, better still, arsenate of lead in solution sprayed over the plants. If arsenate of lead or any other poison spray is used, the outer leaves on which the poison is deposited must, of course, be pulled off when the cabbages are harvested so as to get rid of the poisoned leaves.

B. F., Finger, Tenn.—Swamp cabbage is another name for skunk cabbage. This is a perennial plant with tuberous roots and is common enough to be very well known to most country dwellers. The botany experts dignify it by calling it Symplocarpus Foetidus. Skunk cabbage grows in moist ground and gives forth a fetid odor according to its common and latinized name. This odor is particularly unpleasant when the plant is bruised. It is one of the earliest plants of spring, appearing with a purplish shell-shaped hooded spathe which, after it has pushed forth, is followed by a tuft of long, smooth leaves. It has been used medicinally as an anti-spasmodic, the seeds and roots being the parts taken for this purpose.

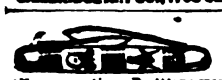
E. H. K., Montrose, Ia.—To tan a horse- or cowhide with the hair on, the skin must be stretched flesh side up and carefully scraped with a dull knife to remove all fleshy matter. Finish by washing well with soap and warm water. Then turn the skin and scrub the hair side well with soft soap and warm water, using care to rinse well. Take one half pound each of common soap and ground alum and dissolve with one ounce of borax in a gallon or less of water. The sufficient rye meal to make a stiff paste and spread this solution over the flesh side of the hide. Fold up lengthwise, with the flesh side in, and let remain in an airy, shaded place for ten days or longer. Then shake out and remove all paste from the surface and wash and dry. A second application may be necessary with so large a skin as a horse-hide. You will have to work the finished dried skin soft by rubbing over a beam and by working it with your hands and on the flesh side with a blunt knife. The secret of the Indians' successful tanning was simply their careful and persistent hand work on the skins they cured.

MRS. W. J. M., Alma, Mont.—The re-silvering of a damaged mirror is by no means an amateur job, and we doubt very much if you can successfully accomplish it at home. The following method is one which, for its simplicity, is recommended by the "Scientific American:" Place the mirror face downward on a table and with a bit of cotton clean and polish the place to be silvered. Now spread out on the spot a piece of tin foil a little larger than the place to be repaired. After spreading smoothly, let fall on the center of it a drop of metallic mercury and with a bit of cotton rub the foil until it becomes brilliant. Now place on this new amalgam a sheet of smooth writing paper and on it pile books or a weight of some sort. The amount of weight need not be great, but sufficient to keep the new amalgam in contact with the glass. The amount of mercury needed should correspond as nearly as possible to three drams to each square foot of surface to be repaired.

MRS. M. P., Henagar, Ala.—It is certain that the early Jewish Christians started in by observing the seventh day as the Sabbath, but before the end of the apostolic days, Sunday, known as "the Lord's Day," had thoroughly established itself as a day of rest and public worship among the Christian believers. How this came about is not known. The establishment of our present Sunday by any law which history has note of, dates from the beginning of the fourth century when the Emperor Constantine gave forth a decree fixing the first day of the week as the one to be observed by the new religion he was sponsoring.

A. M. H., Perste, Ala.—If your brother did not take all of his uniforms with him when he left the service there would be no way in which he could now obtain them. The regimental records of his discharge would not show that he had failed to take his uniforms with him.

W. W., Luttrell, Tenn.—The popular vote in 1912 for Wilson, Roosevelt and Taft was as follows: Wilson, 6,286,214; Roosevelt, 4,126,020; Taft, 3,483,922. Wilson received 435 electoral votes, Roosevelt was a poor second with 88, while Taft brought up the rear with but eight votes to his credit in the Electoral College.



M. S., Lovilia, Iowa.—After all we have said in this column about imitation "old violins" and faked inscriptions, here is another COMFORT reader who believes she has a genuine Stradivarius in her possession. But few of the sweet-toned instruments remain from the work of the famous old fiddle makers and these have been discovered and identified by experts and amateurs who have zealously sought out the prizes. It was a slow process to turn out a fine violin by the hand methods of the past and it would have been a physical impossibility for a small part of the Strads to have been produced which now masquerade as genuine. Credulous buyers are in great part responsible for the success of the fraudulent makers of "old violins" with artful inscriptions such as the one M. S. describes.

Kill Rats and Save Money

By Sam E. Conner.

Copyright, 1920, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

KILL a rat and save five dollars!

That is an impelling slogan for a war on rats and there are reasons a-plenty for such a war. The rat does a property damage in the United States each year estimated at a billion dollars of which food stuff is the major item. The estimated value, annually, of the farm crops destroyed by these animals is $200,000,000. These are authenticated figures compiled from the various states. The rat costs Denmark, France, Germany and Great Britain $166,000,000 annually.

Great as is the property loss caused by the rat, it is not that alone which has aroused man to battle, but a desire for healthful cities has determined the human race to stamp out the greatest menace of all to good health.

Every outbreak of the bubonic plague in recent years is directly traceable to the rat. That the rat is the transmitter of the plague is not newly acquired knowledge. In the Book of Samuel we read how, for the purpose of preventing the spread of disease, the Philistines made offerings of golden images of the mice. Coins and monuments of the earliest times prove that the ancients associated the rat with the plague. Æsculapius, the god of healing, is represented by the Greeks with a rat at his feet.

The rat is not a native of America but came here with man. Like man, the rat is a wanderer. The black rat was first to come across the ocean. He was followed by the brown rat. Before the onrush of the brown, the black rat has practically disappeared in this country. There are but four states, Nevada, Utah, Wyoming and a portion of Montana, in which the brown rat is not known.

It has been said that there are 200,000,000 rats in the United States and that each one destroys five dollars' worth of food stuff annually. This is a lot of rats, and, while no census has ever been taken of the rats of America, it is regarded as a conservative estimate.

As has been said, the figures gathered by those who have made a study of the damage done by rats show that they destroy food crops to the value of $200,000,000 in this country, but this is not all the harm they do in the way of property loss. They are responsible for many fires, which are never charged to them. "Defective wiring" is frequently the cause assigned for many a strange and mysterious fire, which should be charged to his Ratship. It is by no means necessary for a rat to get at the household match supply in order to start a blaze. He will eat the insulation off the electric wiring in a house just as readily as he will take a nibble at the business end of a match. It costs the telephone and telegraph companies of this country many hundreds of thousands of dollars to repair the havoc done by the rats in cable conduits and in buildings.

At least one well authenticated case of robbery by rats leads to the belief that many of the mysterious thefts of rings and small jewels are directly chargeable to the rat. In 1908, more than four hundred dollars' worth of such jewelry disappeared from the home of Senor Viada in Mobile, Ala. There was not a trace of the thief. The police were unable to locate the missing jewels. Later, when repairs were being made to the house the jewels were all found in a rat's nest.

Many an unexplainable lameness in horses and mules is without doubt due to rats gnawing the animals' hoofs. Authentic records of such cases are on file; also of where the rat has eaten the hoofs of sheep and pigs. Unique among these cases is that of three young African elephants in the famous menagerie of Carl Hagenbeck so injured by rats eating their feet that it was necessary to kill them.

Again, the rat does not confine his depredations to land. He is a sailor, and on his voyages attacks cargo and fittings as well as stores. It has never been possible to accurately estimate the damage done on shipboard by rats. It is only in recent years that any effective means of keeping these animals off ships has been devised.

The most efficacious of all methods for keeping the rats off ships is the metal saucer or funnel clamped around the hawser which makes the craft fast to the wharf. The shape of this is such that it becomes an impossible barrier for the rat. There is, however, always the chance that rats will get aboard in the cargo. This can only be averted by a rigid examination, which is not always practicable.

Sailormen of the old school looked upon rats with a certain amount of tolerance. They credited the rat with an instinct superior to man's powers of observation and ability to reason. Sailors believed that rats would always leave a ship which was in danger of sinking. In support of this, Jack Tars would recite instance after instance where such an exodus took place before a vessel went to Davy Jones' locker. This sentiment has changed in recent years. No longer do sailors regard the rat as a necessary evil. It has been thoroughly demonstrated to them that because a ship is ratless is no sure sign it is about to founder.

The first scientifically planned campaigns against the rat were at New Orleans and San Francisco. So effective did these prove that the bubonic plague was stamped out in both cities. Precautions since maintained have kept those cities ratless. In both these campaigns every effort was made to clear shipping of rats. Vessels were fumigated and all sorts of mechanical devices used to prevent the animals either getting from ship to shore or the reverse.

The effectiveness of this fight against rats in those cities is shown by the records of rats killed. In San Francisco between January 4 and May 28, 1908, there were killed 98,417 rats. From December 28, 1907, and January 1, 1915, there had been killed in San Francisco 821,102 rats of which record had been secured. Thousands more were killed of which no count was had. The first year of the campaign in San Francisco there was paid a bounty of ten cents per rat and the records show that during that time as high as 11,000 rats were destroyed in a week. In New Orleans during one six-month period 551,570 rats were slaughtered. Of these 271 were found to be afflicted with bubonic plague. There, too, the kill frequently went as high as 11,000 rats in a week.

The ferocity of the rat has been pictured from the earliest days. Stories of attacks by rats upon mankind have always been numerous. Today these tales are questioned. Because some chap centuries ago saw fit to write thrilling tales of men maimed and killed by rats, of babies in the cradle whose deaths were due to rats, it is not now accepted as proof. Show me is what present generations are saying. Diligent search fails to show an authentic case where a rat has deliberately attacked a human being. If attacked, nearly all rats will defend themselves. Ordinarily, say those who have made a study of these animals, the probability of being bitten by a rat is very remote, and the bite, should you receive one, is not poisonous.

Contrary to the general understanding, cats are the least effective agents against rats. Not more than one cat in twenty-five is a ratter. This holds true among cats kept around storehouses and the so-called homeless cat. It is only when a rat starts to run that a cat will attack it. Cats will often eat from the same dish with a rat.

Traps and poisons are the only effective agents with which to combat the rat. Ferrets and terriers which are well trained are of value under some conditions. Poison is not suitable for use in dwellings. Traps and protective construction are the correct home method. In factories, warehouses and around wharves, both traps and poison are useful. These are also of value on the farm. There, too, man is aided in his fight against the rat by certain natural enemies of the animal. Snakes, owls and skunks all prey on the rat. In this connection it may be mentioned that the practice of placing bounties on certain animals and birds is unwise. The damage which these birds and animals do to crops is more than offset by the good they do in killing rats.

Centuries of combat with man have developed the instinct of the rat. He is shrewd and wise. The ability of a rat to detect danger is uncanny. Frequently they will take a piece of bread upon which has been placed poison and eat the very last crumb of the bread without touching the poison. Unless traps are carefully handled so as to leave no trace of human hands, rats will not go near them.

That the rat has a cannabalistic tendency is well authenticated. Prof. Lantz, who has made a careful study of the animals, relates instances whereby this habit is well established. At one time he had two females and a male rat in a cage for observation. Several times young were born. None of these ever survived. They would be in the nest at night, but would disappear during the night. On several occasions remains of the young were found in the cage, but he was never able to determine which of the adult animals killed the little ones. At last both females gave birth to a litter of young, totaling 22. The next morning the young were all there, but the male was dead.

But it will not be wise to wait for the rats to kill one another if America is to save $200,000,000 of food stuff annually, as well as a grand total of a billion dollars' worth of property. Vigorous, determined steps must be at once taken by all to fight this, the so-called, greatest enemy of the human family.

and right. For besides physical exercise we must have exercise for our minds and souls. I take time to enjoy nature and always keep my mind open to her impressions. I love fresh air and I don't consider it a fad either—only a necessity if one would keep young. I have always had a great love for music so when the opportunity for hearing some really good music presents itself I take it.

There is nothing that will so refresh one intellectually as a good book. As Frances said in March COMFORT, "reading each day keeps the doctor away." And right here I should like to suggest to Tillamook Bayreader that for her intellectual refreshment she get that education. It will be surprising how much she can learn by devoting a few minutes each day to study and she can think just as much of her husband, while acquiring an education and after, as she could to remain ignorant and I admire her for being ambitious enough to desire one.

Mrs. Mike, I like your birthday cake plan. More people would have blessed memories of happy childhood if all parents availed themselves of the small things of life that make up its enjoyment.

But I am getting off my subject. To keep young we should have interests outside our home. By that I mean we should keep interested in the outside world if we do not wish to become dull and uninteresting. And that we are soon to have the right to vote is another reason why we should keep informed. Let us get out our March COMFORT and read again what George L. Garrison wrote concerning this. Then let us prove that we are as capable of voting as are the men.

Another factor in the preservation of health is—learn self control. Oh, how the number of wrinkles we possess is increased by those unnecessary fits of anger. And don't worry or hurry. Let us plan our work and if little interruptions occur (as they often do) take them quietly and as a matter of course.

If we are to retain our youth let us be happy and talk happiness. How many of us have gone to a neighbor's and given her a full account of that terrible headache we had all day yesterday or proved to her how nervous we had been all week? More than once I have caught myself talking about ill health when I should have been counting my blessings. However I am endeavoring now to think and say only the pleasant things.

I will close with the hope that you will do your best to live up to the duty which is every woman's—that of keeping your body and mind in a perfectly healthy condition or in other words, keeping young as long as possible. POLLY.

Polly.—You will appreciate to the fullest extent the poem quoted above which I happened to come across printed in the Boston Post the very day I received your letter.—Ed.

The Vow

By Clinton Scollard in New York Sun and Herald.

Lo, I have made unto myself a vow,
Now May has come, and all her ways are fair
And there are adumbrations in the air
Of the pale lilac and the dogwood bough,
And now the new moon's tip is like the prow
Of some frail silver barque, and everywhere
The senses fresh fertilities declare
In the cool loam uplifted by the plough.

That I will go into a quiet place,
Haunted no more by a wandering bird,
Girdled no more than by the leaf or cress,
And pausing there an uncompanioned space,
Should it be but for the framing of a word,
Give thanks to God for all earth's loveliness.

IOWA.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

We are three chums and two of us are sisters. Our ages are between sixteen and twenty. We have been contented to listen to our elders until Old Maid and some of the others have said a good bit in disfavor of our clan. Some one said they didn't see why men would pick a gay butterfly of a girl in preference to an older girl who knew how to cook.

We think that the girl who can't cook by the time she is sixteen is rather to be pitied. It is not the fault of the child but the fault of the mother.

In the second place the men choose the younger girls because they are butterflies. If the Old Maids would fix up a bit and put a little pep into their walk we believe they would stand a better chance against us younger girls. And then don't act so self-reliant and don't show so much good sense and the men and boys will like you better. They like dependence. They want some one they can protect, not a protector. But cheer up, there are enough men for us all.

Now for our problem: Our school has purchased a Victrola and we would like to have the sisters send in suggestions for making money to pay for it. We have given a hard-times social and box suppers and it isn't more than half paid for.

THREE BUTTERFLIES.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

How many mothers make their boys help with the housework? If you don't, begin right now and see how quickly the morning work is done. I have five boys and one girl and I've always taught my boys from the time they were large enough to wash a dish that they

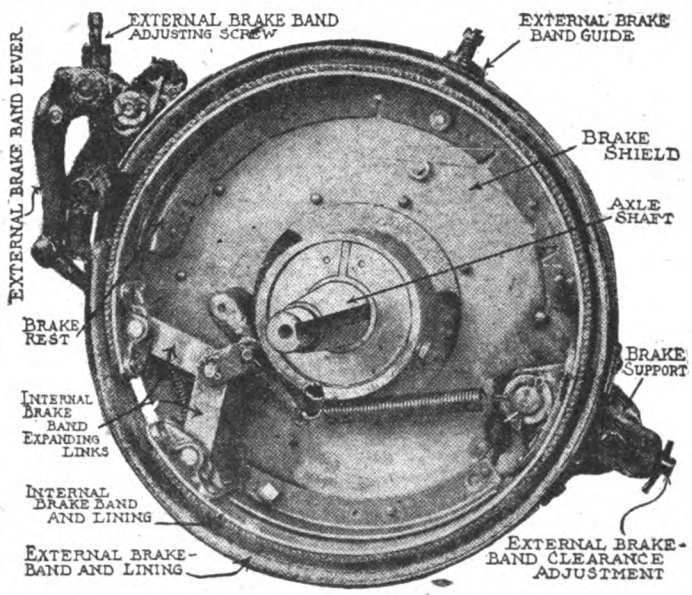
Automobile and Gas Engine Helps



Questions relating to gasolene engines and automobiles, by our subscribers, addressed to COMFORT Auto Dept., Augusta, Maine, will be answered by our expert, free, in the columns of this department. Full name and address is required, but initials only will be printed. That we may intelligently diagnose your trouble please state the year in which your car was made.

Brakes

JUST as important as the production of power to make the car go is the production of friction to make it stop. Without the ability to stop when desired, the car would be practically useless. The present-day practice is to use two sets of brakes and apply them to the rear wheels. Some of the earlier designs of cars had but one set of brakes but due to the chances of an accident in case the brakes refused to hold, there were developed a second set of brakes which were intended to be used in an emergency. This set still retains the name "emergency brake." The usual braking custom is to attach a steel drum to each rear wheel and to have the service brake act against the outside of the drum and the emergency brake against the inside of the drum.

The service brake, as its name implies, is the most used. In fact, it is often abused. For this reason it is of the contracting type and operates by tightening against the outside of the steel drum. This outside position is essential as constant use of this brake results in wear and frequent adjustment to the mechanism. The adjustments are usually handy and it is an easy matter to compensate for wear.

The emergency brake is used but little and it, therefore, has become the practice to make this brake of the expanding type and to operate against the inside of the steel drum. The wear on the emergency brake mechanism is usually trifling and it is customary to provide no other adjustment than means for shortening the pull cable or rod. Due to the emergency brake giving but little bother, its inaccessible position is no handicap.

Details relative to brake adjustments vary for the different makes of cars but there are certain principles which are approximately the same. In the accompanying illustration we show the brake mechanism for a popular present-day car, the rear wheel having been removed.

The service brake is a flexible steel band lined with friction material. As can be expected, a steel band is easily bent out of shape and, therefore, means have been provided for maintaining an even spacing between the band and the steel drum. Should, for any reason, the band bear on the drum only in one or two places, its effectiveness is impaired. To guard against this condition, a brake support and one or more guides are provided to hold the band in the correct relative position to the steel drum. It is absolutely imperative that the band bear for its entire surface on the drum, otherwise there will be a squeaking sound when the brakes are applied and they will not be effective.

In time, wearing of the braking lining takes place to such an extent as to cause greater movement of the toggle-joint to contract the band on the drum. If the wear becomes too great, the movement will not be sufficient to contract the band and when this condition exists it is necessary to move the ends of the band closer together. This is accomplished by turning a nut on a set-screw. The brake pull-cables or rods are usually supplied with adjustable yokes and often it is only necessary to shorten the rod or cable to make the brakes effective. However, when adjustment to the rods or cable fails to bring about the desired results, the first step is to determine the condition of the friction material attached to the brake bands. If it is worn out, the bands should be relined with new material. The material is usually riveted to the bands and it is essential that special care be taken to sink the rivets well into the friction material, otherwise they will bear on the steel drum and the brakes will not hold.

To the writer's way of thinking, the dual braking system besides having its good features also has its bad ones. For example, it has been his privilege to investigate several accidents and it has been determined that brakes did not hold. Undoubtedly the driver used the service brakes until they refused to hold and then shifted over to the emergency set. He failed to have the service brakes repaired and went along using the emergency set until they in turn wore out and refused to hold. At a certain time he needed the brakes to take a firm hold on the drums which they refused to do and the accident was the result. One set of brakes would necessitate the driver keeping them in good repair. However, if the two sets (service and emergency) are used as intended, the arrangement is ideal. If the service brakes lose their effectiveness, have them fixed. Do not go along and rely upon the other set and wear them out, leaving you with no means of braking.

Useful Pointers

Don't Fasten Chains with Car

It is poor economy to fasten the tire chains too tightly or to make them stationary, such as fastening them to a spoke of the wheel. More than one tire has been entirely ruined by disregarding this advice. The chain should be allowed to creep around the tire, thereby equally distributing the wear. Common "horse sense" dictates that if the chain cannot creep the cross links concentrate the wear to one point, which naturally damages the casing.

Gasolene Container

It frequently happens that the motorist desires to prime the cylinders to effect a start, but investigation discloses that he has not brought along anything which will hold gasolene. A simple way out of the difficulty is to remove the dust cover from the tire valve stem, tie a string around the neck and lower it into the gasolene tank. When filled it will contain sufficient gasolene for priming purposes.

Emergency Light

If stalled on the road some dark night and a light is required to make repairs, scrape together a pile of sand about four inches high, drain about a cupful of gasolene from the tank and pour over the sand. The saturated sand will burn about 20 minutes. Remember this hint when on a basket picnic and a fire is required to cook or warm some of the eatables.

Clean Underpan

Approximately every car and truck has a pan directly under the engine. This receptacle catches oil, grease, gasolene, etc., and unless cleaned out at least once a month it becomes a frying pan for the car in case of fire. A great many cars could be saved from the flames if proper attention was given to the cleaning out of the pan.

Gasolene Fire

Never try to extinguish a gasolene fire with water. Gasolene is lighter than water and will therefore float on the surface of the latter and increase the area of the fire. A chemical fire extinguisher is best suited for the purpose, although sand, if applied in large quantities, will prove an able substitute, and road dust will serve in an emergency.

Gaskets

When cutting a new gasket from material you have on hand, bear in mind that water, oil and gasolene will not run through the material. More than one person has put a gasket in place without cutting a hole for the passage of the gas or liquid and has then spent two or three busy hours thinking what the cause might be for the peculiar action of the car. Moral: Cut out the center of the gasket.

Questions Answered

W. G. H., Upland, Nebr.—The magneto lamp regulator for Ford cars is undoubtedly nothing more or less than a choke coil which sufficiently controls the electrical output from the magneto to permit the use of six-volt lamps. By using this regulator in conjunction with six-volt bulbs, you should obtain better light at slow engine speeds.

L. H. C., Park, Ind.—From the description contained in your letter, the writer would assume that when you feed the gas quickly after starting, the engine will stall. On the other hand, if the choker is pulled out, the engine will take the gas without difficulty. If the above is the trouble you are experiencing, it is caused by a lean carburetor mixture. Pulling the choker enriches the mixtures, which would explain why the operation is satisfactory when you choke the carburetor. Try opening the carburetor needle valve a trifle more and I believe your difficulty will disappear. (2) It is rather vague when you only specify regulator. There are several parts which might be referred to as a regulator, and if you will therefore furnish more details of your difficulty, the writer will be in a better position to attempt a solution for your trouble. (3) Not knowing the length of time you have been bothered with the leaking of grease from the left side of the rear axle, and when taking into consideration that your car is a current model, the writer hesitates to make a suggestion. He believes it would be the best economy for you to have a mechanic take off the left rear wheel and inspect the roller bearing and washers. If you will explain the trouble to him, his inspection should enable him to determine the cause for the oil leakage.

Through the columns of this department subscribers may have free advice from our eminent legal adviser on all questions of law except divorce matters.

Address Home Lawyer, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Sign your true name and give your address. Name will not be published.

M. S., South Dakota.—We do not think the owner, of the farm you live on, has any interest in the pig he gave you, unless there is some agreement in connection therewith not stated in your letter to us.

R. M. T., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that there is no limitation of the right of parents to disinherit children by will, except certain small allowances for children under seven years of age and special allowances for minor children; we think, however, any person in interest in an estate, has the legal right to contest a will in any case where there is a question of testamentary capacity on the part of the testator, or upon the question of undue influence exercised upon the testator, or if the will is not legally drawn or executed, or if it does not express the testator's true intent.

N. J. B., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the consent of the parents or guardians is necessary to procure a license for the marriage of either males or females under 18 years of age.

MRS. J. D., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of your husband, if he leaves no will, and leaves no child or descendant, you will be entitled to receive one half of his personal and real estate in addition to some small allowances allowed the widow by statute, the balance of his estate going to his parents, brothers and sisters or their descendants, depending upon who is left, but if he leaves no kindred you will receive his whole estate; we do not think your child by a former marriage will receive any share of his estate, unless some provision is made for her by will.

MRS. R. O. C., Arkansas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and children, the widow is entitled to receive, in addition to homestead rights if there be a homestead and she does not own one in her own right, dower of a one-third interest for life in his real estate and one third of the personal estate absolutely, the balance of the estate going to his children, regardless of the fact that they were born of a former marriage. We do not think he can bar his wife's dower by will if she survives him. We think the life insurance policy made payable to his estate would upon payment become part of his personal estate, and be disposed of accordingly.

MRS. L. B. F., Maine.—We think that if the matter is serious enough you should have the man who annoys you summoned before some local magistrate or justice of the peace.

MISS M. W., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that every executor or administrator can be compelled to file an account of his proceedings within 12 months after his appointment and every 12 months thereafter and at such times as the probate court may require.

MRS. E. M. H., Virginia.—Under the laws of your state, we think that, if the mother of the children you mention has a good character, the courts will award her the custody of her children in preference to the husband and father who eloped with another woman. We think he can be compelled to support such of the children as are of tender years and unable to support themselves.

A. W., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired after marriage by either the husband or wife by onerous title is community property, and that the husband has the management and control of the personal property of the community, with the like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate; the wife may also convey her separate estate; husband and wife must join in all deeds and mortgages of the community real estate; upon the death of the wife the entire community property goes to the husband, but upon the death of the husband one half of the community property goes to the wife and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband; if he leaves no will, one-fourth of the other half goes to the widow and the balance in equal shares to his children, if no descendants, it all goes to the widow.

MRS. H. S., Iowa.—We do not think your husband can marry your sister, during your lifetime, unless you are divorced from him, without committing bigamy and being subject to punishment and further imprisonment for his act; we think that if he again refuses to support his small children, if they are unable to support themselves when he is released from prison, he will again be subject to punishment for his act. We think, however, if you are receiving a widow's pension for these children's support you should be careful not to forfeit same for the doubtful chance of collecting support money from him, as if your husband persists in his purpose of casting his lot with your sister instead of his lawful wife and family, and is willing to face term after term of imprisonment in order to accomplish his purpose, he may in the long run prove himself stronger than the law.

MRS. X, Michigan.—Unde the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a husband can be compelled to support his wife, living with him in the home provided by him, in a manner commensurate with his means and station in life, unless she has means of her own sufficient to provide for her own support.

S. B. R., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the property given you by your husband could not be sold to satisfy debts incurred by him after the deed of the property to you was placed on record, unless it can be proved that he still retained an interest in the property and that same was transferred to you simply to hold for him as a trustee or under some other similar understanding; we think, however, if his obligation or debt was incurred prior to the transfer or recording of the deed to you, the same could be set aside in case it can be substantiated that the property was deeded to you in order to avoid the payment of his debt.

MISS X. Y. Z., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that marriages between second cousins are not prohibited.

MRS. M. A. B., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that females may marry without the parents' consent at 18 years of age.

A. P., Texas.—Under the laws of Missouri, we are of the opinion that a deed of real estate to the husband and wife creates a tenancy by the entirety, and that the whole property, upon the death of one, becomes the sole property of the survivor, and that such survivor could sell same without the consent of their children.

MRS. E. D., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that the marriage of the young woman you mention, without her parents' consent, is a valid marriage unless same is legally set aside by the judgment or decree of some court having jurisdiction; we think that if this young lady misrepresented her age at the time of procuring the marriage license, she is liable to punishment for such act.

MRS. H. A. O., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving a widow and more than one child, his surviving widow, in addition to homestead rights, if any, and certain small allowance from the personal estate, would be entitled to receive one third of the estate, the balance going to his children in equal shares, the descendants of any deceased child taking their parent's share. We do not think a married woman has any interest in her husband's property during his lifetime, except that she is entitled to support from him, unless she deserts him without proper cause and unless she has property of her own sufficient to provide for her support.

Don't pass by

And let that corn keep hurting

Don't pass a drugstore that sells Blue-jay if you ever suffer corns.

Blue-jay stops the corn pain. A simple touch applies it. And soon the toughest corn will loosen and come out.

The Blue-jay way is gentle, easy, sure. It comes in plaster or in liquid form.

It is scientific—a product of this world-famed laboratory.

Millions now employ it. Most of the corns that develop are being ended by it.

Compare it with old methods, harsh and uncertain. Learn what folly it is to merely pare and pad corns.

Use Blue-jay on one corn tonight. Watch that corn go. Then remember that every corn can thus be ended the moment it appears. A week-old corn should be unknown in these days.

impossible and demoralizing pictures, catch the crowd. It is no good singing the praises of farm life for the farmer's life is a hard one and even though he is the only man that is really independent, it takes nerve, determination and a love of outdoors to hold him to his job. If the farmer could clean up thirty thousand dollars in a year as some Polish farmers did here on Long Island during the war, there would be no abandoned farms and people would be rushing out of the cities to become millionaire farmers. So you see, like most problems, the farm problem is largely an economic one. It is a question of freight, of wages, of the elimination of parasitical middlemen, distribution and organization. The farmer and the government as far as possible are trying to solve these problems and you, Sam, should lend a helping hand. Advice is all right, but only one man ever took advice and he is dead.

SEDAN, N. MEX.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am ten years old, five feet tall. I go to Sedan school. We live in a consolidated district. They haul the children to school in trucks. We have a very good school. They teach all the grades from the primary up, including the high school grade. I am in the fourth grade. I take reading, arithmetic, language, geography, writing and spelling. I like my teacher fine. We have taken COMFORT for years and think it is a fine paper.

Your cousin, CHESTER A. CHADWICK.

Chester, I am glad to hear you have such excellent educational facilities, but I am somewhat astonished at the methods employed to get you to school. I was often hauled to school by the ear but never by a truck. Do you sit in the truck or do they put a rope around you, hitch it to the truck, turn on the power and then let her rip? Well, I must take off my hat to the authorities in your district for they are determined to get you to school even if they have to haul you there with trucks. New Mexico is setting an example to the rest of the country for at the time of writing there are 18,279 schools closed in the U. S because of the shortage of teachers, and 41,900 schools are being taught by teachers below the recognized standard, employed temporarily. The largest shortage of teachers reported so far is as follows: Kentucky, 2,255; Texas, 2,055; Virginia, 2,000; Georgia, 1,500; North Carolina, 700; Iowa, 600. The shortage of sub standard teachers is enormous. Texas is shy 4,000 alone; Illinois, 1,200; New York, 1,100. Men are going out of the teaching profession entirely and it is male teachers that the schools need. In 1890, 37 per cent of the teachers were men, in 1918 the percentage had dropped to 17. Would you believe it, in some rural sections teachers are only getting $200 a year, less than $4 a week; that $12 is the average pay for elementary teachers; and $20 a week for high school teachers? We have millions of people who cannot read or write. We scream it from the housetops that we are the richest nation on earth with the most abundant resources. That is a little bit of our obnoxious, spread-eagle boasting, and is not based on fact, for Russia, European and Asiatic, is far away ahead of us in natural resources and millions of years ahead of us just now in national stupidity. Thirteen million dollars is being appropriated in this state to rectify this deplorable condition. Teachers, male and female, have got to be paid as well as the stenographer, the engineer, the plasterer and the hod carrier and other members of the millionaire professions. It is on education, and that means the teacher, that the whole future of this country depends. If we backslide in this direction and skimp our educators, our whole national structure will fall to pieces.

MICOLA, MO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

It snowed yesterday and last night and I can't hardly get out of the house it was on an average four or five inches. My school has been going on just one month and got a certificate Friday. I went every day and was not even tardy. I am twelve years old and in the seventh grade I have a good teacher he lives at Hayti. I studied six books at school so you see I haven't any time for play. How many of you like to have spelling matches at school? I sure do we had one Friday. I want to ask a favor will some of you send me the song "Put My Little Shoes Away?" Well, I'll have to help mama cook supper hoping Billy the Goat won't get this. EDYTHE SETTLE.

Edythe, it is lovely to talk about snowstorms in the good old summertime, when you've got prickly heat, and it's nice to think about prickly heat when the snow is up to the roof, and the only way to get out of the house is through the chimney. You tell us you could hardly get out of the house because it was on an average of four or five inches. I can't imagine how you ever succeeded in either getting in or out of a house only four or five inches high. You must be a human pancake. Probably you refer to the snow and not to the house. I'm glad to know your school has got a certificate, and hope you will get one soon, but if you do, I don't think it will be for punctuation. So your teacher lives in Hayti, which is one of the Central American republics we have taken under our wing. The colored gentlemen who live there and who shot up a number of our soldiers when we took possession, like us so well that they fight to get into jail where they can be fed and have an easy time. Uncle Sam, like John Bull, is getting to be quite an Empire builder, and it will take some of the narrow parochialism out of a number of his citizens with small-town minds, to know that we are being forced to bear the white man's burden; that there is no such thing as isolation and that we are being compelled to assume responsibilities which, though they may be burdensome, will at least help to broaden our minds and give us a world vision. So I'm glad your teacher comes from Hayti, though it must be some journey for him if he goes home every night. But there, maybe he has a flying machine. Spelling matches are all right but don't carry any in your pockets or they may set fire to your clothing. I'd rather take a chance with a spelling match than a spelling bee for scientists have invented a safety match but no one has invented a safety bee. I'm sure the cousins will gladly send you a copy of the song, "Put My Little Shoes Away." However, to save you from possible disappointment, Edythe, I have written a few lines on the subject which you can sing to the tune of "Silver Threads Among the Gold."

Put my little shoes away,
For, oh, those shoes they broke my heart,
Fifteen bucks I had to pay
For them—and then they fell apart.
I dreamed that in those shoes I'd caper,
But I wore them just one brief half day,
For I found they were only paper—
So put my little shoes away.

Holland is sending us wooden shoes, Edythe, and unless you want to go barefooted or walk around on your head, I advise you to invest in a pair, for no one knows when paper shoes will go out and leather shoes come in once more.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In writing this department always sign your true name and give your address; if not, your letter will receive no attention. Name will not be published.

WELL, my hearties—that's how an old sailor friend of my childhood used to talk—how is the world using you? Pretty badly, to judge from some of the letters I receive or, at least, you think it is and that amounts to the same thing, or worse. I know, I've felt that way myself at times, but we must "perk up" and be cheerful and sunshiny to match the summer weather we are having. There is always something to be glad about if we but look for it—though I'm not such a little Pollyanna myself—so let's look harder than ever, But first I'll take a look at your letters.

BLUE EYES, W. Va.—If you are only seventeen or eighteen years of age and have been keeping company with a young man for two years and he hasn't mentioned marriage to you, you needn't lose any sleep over it; perhaps he has respect for your youth. But if you are twenty-six or twenty-seven years old, and of a marriageable age and inclination, he should declare his intentions and, if not serious, step aside and make room for someone who is.

BESSIE, Okla.—If you think there is the slightest chance of the young man in question falling in love with you and wishing to marry you, you should tell him of your former marriage and that you are not, as yet, divorced. And be very, very careful of your conduct if you want a divorce. Some judges are so fussy.

LEILA, Miss.—My dear, the man who jilts a good girl after two years' engagement, without a word of explanation, is a pure, unadulterated cad and you should consider yourself fortunate and if you must feel badly, pour out your sympathy on your "best girl friend" who is reported engaged to him. She is the one who will need it, not you. Some people don't know when they are well off, do they? (2) Go to work if you want to and your mother is willing. There are lots worse things that could happen to you.

GREY EYES, Miss.—It looks to me as if you care more for him than you realize, but make sure. Have him stay away from you for a month, or three or six months, but if you take too long a time to make up your mind some other girl may snap him up for a "good man is hard to find."

DOLORES, Texas.—You've got the right idea, Dolores, and don't show any favors or allow any liberties if you want to win him. To soften would be to lose him. Be cordial and nice but let him understand that with you it must be all or nothing and half-engagements and promises don't go.

BROWN EYES, Texas.—COMFORT is a "pretty good old paper," isn't it? Glad it helps you. If you are sure you didn't imagine his mother's coldness toward you, you did right in not going to his home so often. Don't give her a chance to say you "chased" him, but if he wants to come to your home, well, that is an entirely different proposition. It would be proper to ask him if he received your letter. Your letter was exceptionally well written.

A. M. W., Minn.—Feeling as you do toward the man your parents have chosen for you, it would be a sin to marry him, and the chances are you would be very unhappy. Try to find work, there must be something you can do.

PEGGY, Texas.—September isn't so far away. Wait patiently and by that time you'll know whether or not he is fooling you. If you care enough about him to marry him wouldn't it be a good idea to start in trusting him a little now—but don't trust any man who doesn't show proper respect for you.

JACK, Texas.—Should a girl confess past misdeeds to her fiancee? That's a question that has puzzled wiser heads than yours or mine and hasn't been settled yet. It depends upon the misdeeds and results to some extent, I suppose, but it is usually safer to make such a confession before marriage rather than after.

LILLIAN, Iowa.—I dislike to advise you for or against divorce. It seems unfair to make children suffer when they are innocent and the children of divorced parents do pay, one way or another. But you know your own affairs better than I do and can judge better what to do. Why not talk matters over with your husband and come to some sort of an understanding? Perhaps a vacation of a few weeks from each other would work wonders. Don't act hastily or rashly.

HAPPY WIFE, Ala.—My, how refreshing to know there are happy wives and it does me good to have you write that you want to be happy and make your husband happy. As I've said before, making others happy is one way of making yourself happy. It doesn't seem there could be any harm in the dances you mention.

JESSIE, Minn.—Don't propose leap year or any other year.

MAZIE, Florida.—Don't marry one man if you love another better, but it looks to me as if No. 2 were more worthy of love.

SARAH, N. C.—Girls of fifteen and one half years are prone to fall "desperately in love" with handsome young boys and to fall out of love with them in a little while, and when that happens it simplifies matters so much if they aren't married; so don't be in a hurry. You are too young to marry now, but if you are as much in love with this handsome young man in a couple of years from now it would be all right to marry him and go to Conn., or China, even with him.

BEULAH, Miss.—Your papa had better be careful how he laughs at the Talks With Girls or else sometime when he wants to know if it is proper to wear a belt and suspenders at the same time (and only a pessimist does that) or which corner of his handkerchief should be allowed to peep coyly out of his breast pocket, then, I won't tell him. (1) Is it permissible to use other than black or blue ink on tinted paper? Well, red ink on pink paper wouldn't harmonize so very well. The best way is not to use tinted paper, just white or a creamy white, and I like black ink best. Yes, indeed, I do think our letters should be written on as good stationery as can be afforded. Our letters are the reflection of ourselves. When we get a carelessly written letter, on cheap, gaudy paper, we are apt to visualize the writer as a cheap, gaudy person, careless as to personal appearance and terribly run down as to heels. (2) Do I think it nice to use perfume? That depends on the perfume and how it is used. A heavy, overpowering scent liberally poured onto clothing and handkerchief and completely overshadowing the personality of the wearer isn't at all nice and I never can feel that such people are clean. I do like just a faint suggestion of perfume that seems to belong to the person and not the person to the perfume. This is obtained more by cleanliness of person and clothing and liberal use of sachet bags and pads in bureau drawers where clothing is kept, and a careful selection of perfume used. Yes, I think maybe my "bark is worse than my bite," as you suggest, but some people need to be barked at, though I'm not at all a barky sort of person.

JESSIE, Iowa.—It is better to be safe than sorry so turn him down before it is too late.

There, run along and have a good time, but remember there are fifty-seven varieties of good times and be sure yours is the right variety and then you won't be sorry and you won't miss any fun, either.

Lovingly, COUSIN MARION.

"How do you account for comets and meteors?" inquired the girl who wanted to seem scientific.

"Now and then," replied the professor who wanted to seem frivolous, "the music of the spheres attempts a little jazz."

tioned. Unfortunately, Sarah had broken two only the day before. They were two long hours driving slowly up and down the street, scanning every corner house, but without being able to decide which to enter.

Finally the officer said there was a suspicious look, to him, about one, where the curtains were all down in the second story, and where one solitary flower-pot was setting in a front window, and he was going to run the risk of being wrong, and investigate.

The two men alighted, bade their coachman return for them in the course of fifteen or twenty minutes, then they quietly entered the house, the door of which was ajar, and ascended the stairs leading to the second story.

* * * * * *

We left Violet, the third day after her sister's departure, weak and spiritless, while Sarah began to fear that she was going to be ill.

Her long season of imprisonment, inactivity and anxiety had nearly worn her out, although we know how bravely she had tried to keep up and look upon the bright side of her troubles; but her appetite forsook her, she refused to eat, and of course her strength failed rapidly.

The fourth day Sarah could not even force her to eat anything, and she made no effort to rise.

The fifth day she seemed to be sinking into a state of lethergy, and Sarah, becoming greatly alarmed, told Mr. Mencke that she must have a doctor.

The man himself looked very anxious when he found that she could not be aroused, but he did not seem willing to call medical aid, although he promised to do so if she was no better on the morrow.

Violet's condition appeared even more alarming when the morrow came, but Mr. Mencke did not make his appearance at all that day.

He had received a telegram from his wife, saying that she would leave for New York the next afternoon but one—that everything was working just as they desired, and she hinted that it would be well to have all preparations completed for their journey north.

Mr. Mencke was so elated over this report that every other thought was driven from his mind, and he spent the day in packing everything he possessed, and arranging for a hasty trip to Canada, though he was somewhat perplexed to know what to do with Violet in case she should be unable to make the journey.

Sarah was very indignant when, about eleven o'clock on the seventh day after his wife's departure, he made his appearance, and unaccompanied by a physician, for Violet seemed very low, and she berated him soundly for his negligence and indifference.

"I don't like this business at all," she told him, "and you may get some one else to do your miserable work, for I am not going to stay here to have the girl die on my hands."

"Pooh! she isn't going to die," he affirmed; nevertheless he was very uneasy as he noticed Violet's extreme pallor, and the dark circles under her half-closed eyes, which appeared to see nothing, while she lay perfectly motionless, except for the heaving of her chest.

"Rouse up, Violet, and eat something. You must not lie here like this," he said, bending over her, and taking one of her limp, cold hands in his.

But a faint fluttering of her white lids was all the evidence the girl gave that she heard him.

"She is just like that all the time, and won't touch a thing, though I've managed to force a few drops of milk between her lips now and then," Sarah said, a heavy cloud on her brow. "You must get a doctor!" she added, resolutely; "if you don't, I'm going to Police Headquarters and tell the whole story."

"You just shut up that kind of talk," the man returned, angrily, and with a menacing look. "I'm not going to be driven with threats; but I guess she'd better have a doctor, and I'll see about it at once."

He turned to leave the room, as if to put his resolution into execution, when just at that instant there came a gentle tap upon the door.

He opened it, without a suspicion of what was awaiting him, and a look of stupid wonder overspread his coarse face as he found himself suddenly confronted by two men, the foremost one an officer of the law, while the sight of Wallace Richardson just behind him told him that his game was up."

"Mr. Mencke!" Wallace exclaimed, no less astonished than the plotter himself.

But he had no opportunity to say more, for the officer, who had taken in the situation with one quick glance about the room, clapped his hand upon the man's shoulder, remarking sternly:

"You are my prisoner, sir!"

"Not if I know it!" retorted Wilhelm Mencke, wrenching himself from his grasp, and then making a bold spring forward to force his way past them.

The officer and Wallace both closed upon him. There was a short, desperate struggle, then a sharp cry of pain, followed by a curse, and then Wilhelm Mencke stood, meek and helpless as a child, from the wrench which the officer had given to a pair of nippers which he had deftly slipped about his wrist.

The next moment he was securely handcuffed, and obeyed in sullen silence when the policeman commanded him to "go inside and sit down."

He was followed by the officer and by Wallace, who, until that moment, had only caught an indistinct glimpse of the slight figure lying upon the bed, while he had been so taken by surprise, and so occupied assisting in making the arrest, that he had scarcely given a thought to the other occupants of the room.

Now, however, as he entered and cast a curious look from Sarah to the bed, he caught sight of Violet's face.

As long as he lived he never forgot the shock that shook him like a reed from head to foot and almost seemed to rend his soul from his body.

There was one awful moment of dumb agony, then, with a wild, hoarse cry, which for months haunted those who heard it, he threw himself on his knees beside that still form and gathered it close in his arms, while he piteously begged Violet to speak to him.

"Oh! my darling," he sobbed, in tearless agony, "you did not die after all. I am not dead as they told you—they lied to you—they deceived us both! Oh! these endless years of longing—of soul-hunger for you! How I have borne them! You must not die now, Violet! Awake, speak to me, love, my heart's queen!"

She did not move—there were no signs of life about her, save the gentle breathing of her chest and the slow beating of her heart—the faint vibration of her weak pulse.

"What have you done to her?" Wallace demanded, almost fiercely, as he turned upon Sarah, who had been regarding the scene with wondering amazement.

"Nothing, sir," she answered, white and trembling, "only she would not eat—she seemed to lose heart a few days ago, and fell into this stupor."

Wallace laid the precious form back upon the bed, a look of anguish on his face.

"Have you wine?" he demanded of the woman.

"No, there is none here."

"Brandy, then—whisky—anything to put a little life into her. Quick! quick!" he cried, in trembling tones.

Sarah searched in Mrs. Mencke's closet and brought out a bottle labeled "Brandy," in which there were a few spoonfuls.

There was part of a glass of milk upon the table beside the bed. Wallace poured some of the brandy into it, and, forcing Violet's white lips apart, put a few drops of the mixture between them.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

had a share in the work; they were to make their own beds, keep their own room clean, wash dishes, mop, help wash and iron and, in fact, everything to be done around a house. I have a certain place for their clothes and they never have to ask where this or that is. We never miss a Sunday from Sunday School and church. We get up and have breakfast and every child knows his job and goes right at it and we soon have our Sunday dinner cooked and ourselves ready for Sunday School. Sometimes we don't have time to get all the work done but we just leave it and go. I wish all mothers would try this plan for our churches and Sunday Schools need their presence every Sunday. Let's not make slaves of ourselves for our children. They think as much or more of us if we don't and this training for boys will enable them to help wifey in later years.

Rainy Day, I, like you, believe in giving father some of the praise as well as mother. I was left twice without a mother, and my second stepmother is living and but for our father's training I don't know where we children would be now. All I am or hope to be is what my father made me. There were seventeen of us, living, two dead, and we were never allowed to go anywhere on Sunday, except church. Today we are all trying to live a Christian life and are the happiest family on earth. We never see any "halves" between us, either. Can any of you beat that for a big family? Let us hear from you.

Udeyne, you tempted me to write. I enjoyed your letter and have wondered why it is more of the Tennessee sisters do not write. I know there must be thousands in our dear old state who take the paper.

Much love to all our big family. MRS. J. B. F.

Mrs. J. B. F.—If boys were taught to even hang up their clothes and put them in place, many a wife would call the mother blessed.—Ed.

ASHLAND, R. R. 1, ALABAMA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I am a little school girl, between twelve and sixteen years of age, and this is why I am writing: Our school teacher advises each pupil to correspond with some other pupil in a different state so I know of no better way than writing to COMFORT and asking if there is a girl in the New England states who would like to correspond with an Alabama girl. I am in the 7th grade.

Mrs. Koga, your letters are fine. They are almost like a visit to the land of Cherry Blossoms.

Miss Winnie Wright, you used to write to the Corner. I once went to school to you and have always loved you.

I like Gene Stratton-Porter's books and some of Mark Twain's.

If you will allow me to write again I will some time.

BERNICE WARD.

CONOWINGO, MD.

DEAR ONES IN THE CORNER:

Will you let me peep into your corner to see what it is like? I don't think your chairs are very comfortable because the sisters can never keep their family affairs to themselves. Don't you know, sisters, that your family affairs should be kept at home, under a fire, not in the open leaves of COMFORT or some other paper? It makes your letter unimportant because no one wants to know the troubles between you and your husband. You can solve them yourselves and perhaps if you don't publish it in COMFORT every time you quarrel, your husband won't quarrel with you. It may be you who is to blame. If you would write only of the pleasant things that have happened it would be better and everybody would enjoy the letters more.

If anyone cares to write to me I shall be very glad indeed.

I am about five and one half feet tall, with dark brown curly hair, Irish blue eyes and face.

HAZEL C. FULTON.

Hazel.—If the Sisters' Corner was confined entirely to cheerful letters it would lose to a certain degree the spirit of friendliness and helpfulness that makes us all one big family. If a person has no troubles it is very easy to think someone else a bore for telling theirs but to the average woman away from relatives and friends or, as is more often the case, unable to confide in them, the sympathy and advice she receives from strangers, who are unbiased in their opinion, is of the greatest help to her and others facing the same problem. Too many sob-letters would be depressing and we need cheery ones to balance up.—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Apply a drop of oil to the door hinges to keep them from creaking.

When making puddings, flavor with fruit juice instead of vanilla.

Spread a newspaper in front of stove before ash pan is taken out and save yourself much labor.

A red hot iron will soften old putty so that it can be removed easily.—MISS CHRISTINE JOHNSON, Illinois.

When hot grease is spilled onto floor, cover quickly with cold water to prevent it soaking into the wood.

If you haven't an egg separator, break your eggs into a small funnel. The white will pass through and the yolk remain.

Wash tablecloths and napkins before hemming; the threads are easily drawn then and the material is soft and easy to sew.

To remove machine oil from white cloth, rub the spot well with lard or butter before wetting, then use soap and hot water.

To cool gelatines and blanc-manges quickly, put a handful of salt and a handful of soda in bowl of water and set the mould in it.

Tea or coffee may be removed from white goods by soaking the spots in glycerine and letting stand several hours. Wash in soap and water.

Sweet peas can be nipped to make grow less tall. Pinch tops off at five inches high. Don't give peas too rich soil.—COMFORT Sister, Portland, Ore.
